Reviewing the history of the reclamation service as a whole, its maximum activity and expenditures were in the year 1907. In 1902 the expenditures were less than $100,000, and in 1903 less than $1,000,000. In 1904 they were $2,500,000; in 1905, $5,000,000; in 1906, a little less than $10,000,000; in 1907, nearly $14,000,000. Then the expenditures decreased to $10,000,000 in 1908, to about $9,000,000 in 1909, and in 1910 they will be a little under $8,000,000. It is expected that in 1911 they will shrink to about $7,000,000, which sum will probably continue to be available during after years, assuming that the water-right charges are paid as they fall due.

This is the most critical period in the history of national irrigation since the passage of the reclamation act, in 1902. By public notices of the secretary of the interior, issued last year, hundreds of water-right installments, involving approximately $1,000,000, became due on April 1, 1910. That date is a memorable one, not only to the settlers, whose entries are liable to cancellation for failure to make the payments due, but also to the reclamation service, which is concerned in securing the return of its investment in the engineering works. It is also a matter of interest to citizens of the number of sections containing feasible projects, the construction of which cannot be undertaken without additional funds. As the repayments are made through the local land offices and not directly to the service, some time must elapse before the actual amounts collected are known. On a number of the projects, like Sun River, Shoshone and Huntley, the settlers have already made their initial payments and will not be delinquent on the second installment until April, 1911, which enables them to market two crops between payments. On several other projects, such as the Minidoka, Klamath, Lower Yellowstone, Belle Fourche, Carlsbad, Truckee-Carson, North Platte and others, the first settlers have had the use of water for two crops, and it is probable that a majority will be able to meet their obligations without difficulty.

Detailed reports from various sources on each of the projects have been received at Washington. The conditions as a whole are described as favorable for a large return to the reclamation fund. On several of the projects there will be no delinquents. On a number of projects the engineering work is not fully completed, but water is ready for large areas and is being supplied on a rental basis pending the announcement of the actual cost of water right. The reclamation service has derived considerable revenue from these sources and at the same time the farmers have been enabled to increase the areas in cultivation. The following financial statement is interesting as showing the status of the reclamation fund and the amounts which thus far have been credited to it through the operations of the reclamation service:

Total moneys received and transferred to the reclamation fund from sales of public lands under reclamation act to February 28, 1910, $58,312,617.02. Approximately $1,500,000 are still in the treasury of the United States, but not yet available.

Moneys received under operations of reclamation act from all sources in cash and credits, for work done, $2,379,475.04, divided as follows: Town-lot sales, $103,673.91; miscellaneous sales, water rentals, etc., $1,694,844.77, collections on water rights, $814,145.34. This does not include any of the moneys collected for the water rights which were due and payable April 1, 1910.

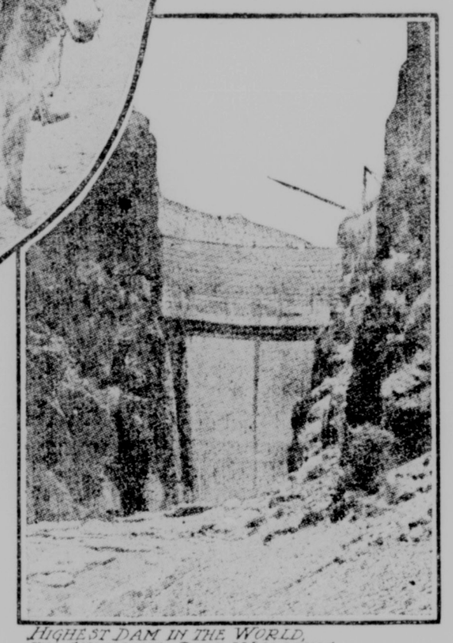
Among the several large projects, one of especial interest is located in northern Wyoming. When the springtime showers and sunshine fall upon the snowy peaks of the lofty mountains on the eastern rim of Yellowstone park a thousand streams will rush downward to fill to brimming the swift-flowing Shoshone river. An important physical change will occur at that time. The flood that once, unchecked and uncontrolled, swept madly through the rock-walled gorge will beat itself to stillness against a massive wall of concrete with which man has blocked the canon. A beautiful lake, 100 feet deep and covering ten square miles, will appear.

In this wonderful gash in the mountains, with perpendicular walls a thousand feet high, the government has erected the highest dam in the world. It is a wedge of concrete 328 feet from base to top. Its height can only be appreciated when compared with that of some well-known structure. New York's famous Flatiron building would not reach within 47 feet of the top of the dam, and the tip-top of the dome of the United States capitol would fall short 21 feet of the parapet.

In the summer, when the crops are thirsty, the big gates will be opened and the pent-up floods will be released into the river below. Another dam, a low structure of concrete, will divert the waters through a tunnel 3¼ miles long into a canal which for 40 miles passes along the upper edge of a broad and fertile valley containing 150,000 acres.

Two years ago it was a desolate waste. Today it contains more than 200 farm houses and three thriving towns. Ten thousand acres produced crops last year on this project. With 16 farm houses along each mile of the main highways, the valley already has a suburban appearance.

More than 280 farm units of 40 to 80 acres each are now available to entry and offer exceptional opportunities for men of moderate means to secure homes in a prosperous and growing country.



HIGHEST DAM IN THE WORLD, THE SHOSHONE DAM, WYOMING

Close to the Black Hills, in South Dakota, lies the beautiful valley of Belle Fourche, containing 100,000 acres of grass-covered prairie. Many miles of canals have been laid across its level surface, and what was only a short time ago the finest free cattle range in this country is rapidly becoming a compactly settled agricultural community.

An impressive engineering feature of this project is the Owl Creek dam, one of the longest and highest earthen embankments in the world. This structure, now nearing completion, is 6,200 feet long, has a maximum height of 115 feet and contains 1,600,000 cubic yards of material.

The Roosevelt dam, which is about completed as you read the story today, is in many respects the most remarkable structure of its kind in the world. Its towering height, 280 feet, its length on top, 1,080 feet, the inspiring scenery in which it is located and the enormous capacity of the reservoir created by it combine to make it one of the most stupendous engineering works of modern times.

Conceive, if you can, two valleys—one 12 miles, the other 15 miles in length, and each from one to three miles wide—transformed into a lake 200 feet deep in places and containing enough water to cover Delaware a foot deep.

The Salt River reservoir, when full, has a capacity sufficient to fill a canal 300 feet wide and 19 feet deep extending from Chicago to San Francisco.

My one regret is that the space allotted me is too little to permit me to describe the charms and advantages of other projects of the government. I should like to tell you of the opportunities on the Klamath project, located in southern Oregon, in a region of unrivaled scenic beauty; of the wonderful progress made in the Boise valley, in Idaho, and the promise of even greater advance as the work of the government nears completion; of the Orland project, in the Sacramento valley, the land of fruits and flowers; of the Rio Grande valley, where there will one day be erected the most stupendous dam in the west—a region in which irrigation began before the Spanish invasion, which will become fruitful and prosperous.

The beacon of hope shines brightly in the west. It beckons the landless man to the manless land.

Small Job.

Him—I was confused for a bit, I confess, but it took me only a moment to collect my wits—

Her—Yes, it couldn't take any longer than that. Go on.

Not an Objection.

"I think he'd like to join your club, but his wife wouldn't hear of it."

"She wouldn't hear of it? Why, I know of half a dozen men who would join our club if their wives couldn't hear of it."

Back to the Tall Timber.

Alfred—Are you going to pass your vacation at the seashore?

Gilbert—No, thank you. It's the woods for mine this year.

Alfred—Don't like the shore, eh?

Gilbert—Oh, I like it well enough, but it's too risky. I passed my vacation there last year and had several narrow escapes.

Alfred—From drowning?

Gilbert—No; summer girls. Seven of them proposed to me.

The Stomach Hold.

Col. H. N. Renouf, at the "Old Guard" banquet at Delmonico's, emphasized the importance to an army of a good commissariat.

"You have perhaps heard," he said, "of the company of privates that a patriotic lady entertained one Memorial day to dinner.

"It was a good dinner, and at its end a pretty maid servant entered with a superb dessert.

"'Dessert, sergeant?' she said to the stalwart young soldier at the head of the table.

"'Desert?' the sergeant answered. 'When I can get eats like this for nothin'? Nixie! Not me!'"

HARD TO PLEASE
Regarding the Morning Cup.

"Oh how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

"Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa were soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

"About two years ago we struck upon Postum and have never been without it since.

"We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. She is today, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State.

"I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good" today when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

"If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, 'You are looking so well!' I reply, 'I am well: I drink Postum. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum.'

"I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good Postum has done us, but if you know how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter, at least not over my name."

The Minister and Civic Affairs.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Recently at Mt. Lake Park, J. Wilbur Chapman, the most successful and celebrated living evangelist, said: "The time has come when the minister of the gospel of Christ should help right the world's wrongs."

Somebody must fight humanity's battles, and great wrongs must be exposed, the intrigues of the demagogue laid bare, and the sordid time server who is in office for the spoils and not for the good of humanity must be held up to public ridicule and his sinister motives revealed so that an indignant people may know where their enemies lurk.

It is not every one who can do this successfully. There may be reasons why the banker or merchant or other business man can't publicly take up questions of vital interest and give them the attention they should have.

The evil doer, the grafter, the venal politician, the mal-administrator, the gambler and all other parasites on human society do not want their sins exposed. A familiar method of dealing with the man who would lay bare their sins is to accuse him of ignorance, or make some other untenable excuse.

This class of pirates are especially hostile to the minister of the gospel when he dares to make known to the public the sins of "gentlemen" in authority.

The writer has been threatened more than once with starvation if he voted or spoke so and so. Preachers have been assaulted recently, had their homes burned and suffered other indignities merely because they told people the truth.

Now as long as a preacher will stay in his pulpit, say nice smooth things, talk of the sins of the Hittites or some other ancient tribe, he will get a gracious smile from the evil doer, and will be considered an ideal minister by this class.

But the moment he ceases to be a mere clerical and becomes a preacher of righteousness, that moment all the thugs, thieves, grafters, gamblers, and menials in office become his inveterate foes.

Now not all politicians and office holders are menials. There are noble men in office and in politics who stand by the preacher of righteousness and defend him; but I speak of that class, and their name is legion, who are wicked and corrupt.

"The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but he makes better time when somebody is after him." The evil doer just wants everybody to let him alone. To illustrate: A school board acting under the advice of certain officials may outrage a community, do imparable harm to the young and rising generation, ignore an honest and sincere protest from a great majority of the patrons and then say, "It's none of your business, you've got to take it, keep still." Unfortunately in this country there has been too much keeping still. We have been a long suffering people. But the day has dawned and the word has gone forth that if men do betray public trust they shall have heaped upon them the just criticisms of a righteously indignant people.

I lay down this proposition: Whatever concerns the physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual interests of a community concerns the minister of the gospel. If this is not true then the wrong methods were used in Bible history and we have handed down to us a wrong system of procedure against sin.

No doubt Pharoah in Egypt said, "Moses is just a newcomer from the desert. He is meddling with our affairs. Hands off." When the old prophets cried out against the wickedness of their day the evil ones cried back, "Preacher in politics." For example notice Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and others.

Jonah is sent to Nineveh, that wicked city, to preach, and I can hear those in authority, whose sins were exposed by his preaching, saying, "This Jonah hasn't been here twenty-four hours, and he has the audacity to tell us what we should do." A newcomer in politics.

However, the people of Nineveh showed more gumption than the Oakland school board. They repented.

John the Baptist had the audacity to tell Herod of his sins and kept on telling until he lost his head. Poor John! They probably called him a "preacher in politics." Why did John not have the wisdom to keep still and let Herod undisturbed go on in his adulterous relations? If he had kept still Herod would have contributed to John's support or paid something on the church debt.

Paul and Silas were new in Philippi. But they began to preach righteousness and we read in Acts 16:20-21, "And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, (or West Virginians) do exceedingly trouble our city, and teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans (or Marylanders)."

Awful indeed! Preachers in politics! Shame! Tim Sullivan or Matt Quay and their like can go into politics and nobody will say a word. But if a preacher condemns meanness somebody howls, "Preacher in politics."

Paul finds his way into Athens. He just had a little time to stay. Of course, it would be an impertinence for a recent arrival from Tarsus to cultured Athens to say anything against existing conditions. Paul is too modest for that. But listen. Now, Athens is older than Oakland is, famous all over the world for her learning. Keep still Paul. But he has the effrontery to say, "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious." Now the Athenians howl and cry, "Preacher meddling, preacher in politics!"

But let us look at some more recent illustrations.

There is a politico-ecclesiastical body in this country, commonly known as the Roman Catholic church, that has through all our history been the implacable foe of the public school, and has sought by intrigue and intimidation, and all other methods known to skillful politicians, to have a division of the school funds, and unfortunately in many instances has succeeded. The reading of the word of God in our public schools has been persistently fought by Catholic prelate, Jew and infidel.

Leo XIII was the author of the following: "Furthermore, in politics, which are inseparably bound up with the laws of morality and religious duties, men ought always, and in the first place to serve, as far as possible, the interests of Catholicism."

I have in my possession a copy of the famous telegram sent to the chairman of the National Republican Convention assembled in the city of St. Louis, Mo., in 1896, by John Ireland, because of which the clause referring to public schools and sectarian appropriations was stricken out of the national platform. Talk about preachers in politics!

I have in my possession the facts and information which if given out would startle the town of Oakland, and since the challenge has been made I am ready.

Wherever in this country our public schools have gone into the hands of Roman Catholic officials, their usefulness and power have been lessened.

I am going to waive now the discussion of other matters for a few paragraphs on the Bible in the public schools. I need not argue the importance of the public school. It has come to stay. Popular government is not possible save in the embrace of general intelligence. You may found a despotism on the muscle of a nation while its brain sleeps. You may marshal an army that shall stand, a living wall of flesh, without a letter of the alphabet outside of the commander's skull. But you cannot maintain a free government without the general diffusion of knowledge and the spread of intelligence. A man to govern himself must understand his needs and possibilities. To see he must have eyes. How can this intelligence be secured? History answers, "By the common school." Let come what will, every lover of liberty and friend of freedom must guard with the sleepless eye of eternal vigilance this safeguard of our power, and strike, if need be, with sword or fagot, for its defense.

Andrew Jackson said, "The Book, sir, the Book, is the rock upon which the Republic stands." In the main America has been loyal to the Bible. Our Constitution and Declaration of Independence get their principles from it. And when it is ignored in our schools and kept from our children, in a few brief decades, we will sink to the level of Spain, Mexico, Italy and South America, in which countries the Bible has been kept from the people and even today when it is distributed by the missionary the priests will follow him up, seize and burn all the copies they can lay hold of. That same spirit would, if it only could, make a gigantic bonfire of the many copies of this blessed old Book in our own land. But thank God that day will never come. The Bible is here to stay. Then why deny our children the right to hear it read in our public schools?

Each house of our national government has a chaplain. The army and navy are supplied with chaplains who receive pay as commissioned officers. States provide chaplains for our penitentiaries. Shall we wait until our children become convicts before we provide for them this blessing?

The state protects the sanctity of the Sabbath and the place of public worship. Will anything help more to safeguard these than a knowledge of the Holy Bible?

The relation of the state to religion is vital. Blackstone said: "Christianity is a part of the common law of England." Webster said. "A republican government must have some religion."

The Catholic position says: "The state has nothing to do with religious education." "That the Bible is a sectarian book." Please tell us to what sect it belongs. In fact with Rome it is not so much a question of taking the Bible out of the schools as it is a question of the destruction of the public schools.

In the Pope's bull of June 22, 1868, he denounces the laws of free schools and free speech as "damnable heresies" in "flagrant contradiction with the doctrines of the Catholic religion."

A trial in Ireland brought out the testimony of a priest that he held positive orders from Archbishop McHale to refuse all the sacraments, even at the hour of death, to those who sent their children to the free schools.

A Catholic paper says: "We hold education to be a function of the church, not of the state; and in our case we do not, and will not, accept the state as an educator." Again we read: "Then by proper combination and co-operation Catholic boards might be secured in many schools, and they, to all intents and purposes, be turned into Catholic schools."

Here we have it. If the public schools can't be destroyed and if we can't have a portion of the public funds to carry on our own schools, then we will get the offices, such as superintendents, principalships, etc., and cripple the public school as far as possible.

Conclusion:—The Catholic, who in the light of these quotations, holds a position as officer or teacher in the public school, will be from the very nature of the case, either false to his church and true to the school, or false to the school and true to the church. The two do not and cannot go together. History tells which has had the allegiance.

I stop here and will continue in a future article.

I want by repetition to say that I stand by my former articles. Not a single proposition in them has been touched or argued away.

The action of the school board was so inexcusable, and their insult to the citiship of Oakland so great that the question will not down. It shall not down. No question is ever settled until it is settled right.

TRUSTEE'S SALE

OF

Valuable Coal

AND

OTHER PROPERTY

Situate in Garrett County, Md., Known as the Gillespie Property.

By virtue of the authority vested in the undersigned Trustee, by decree entered on the 20th day of May, 1910, in the matter of C. D. Gillespie, bankrupt, pending in the District Court of the United state for the Northern District of West Virginia, the undersigned Trustee will, on

at Eleven O'clock A. M.,

at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, the following real estate, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, owned by C. D. Gillespie.

I

All the coal and the right to mine and remove the same, underlying being part of a tract known as "Elk Garden," situate in Garrett county, Maryland, together with the acreage of the surface of said 315 acres and all the rights and privileges granted to the said C. D. Gillespie in connection with said coal property. Two-thirds of said property was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Ada A. N. Halterman, by deed dated the 4th day of June, 1904, of record in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 45, folio 152, and the remaining one-third was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Austin Brown, Sheriff, by deed bearing date December 1, 1908, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 59, folio 453, to which deeds reference is now here had for a more particular description of said property.

This property is situated very near the Western Maryland Railroad, near the station of Henry on said railroad and adjacent to the coal property now being operated by the Davis Coal & Coke Company at its mines at Henry. The coal underlying this property which is to be sold is very valuable.

II

All of the coal underlying a tract of land containing

68 1-2 Acres,

situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being known as a part of the "Elk Garden" tract and being the same coal conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Peter F. Snyder and wife, by deed bearing date October 27, 1905, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 364, to which deed reference is here had for a particular description of said 68½ acres, together with all the rights and privileges as to mining rights, surface and rights of way, as were vested in said Gillespie by said deed.

This 68½ acres of coal is considered very valuable. It is located a distance of about three or four miles from the railroad.

III

An undivided one half interest in ten acres of land, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being also a part of what is known as the "Elk Garden" tract, said undivided one-half interest having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry F. Marshall and wife, by deed dated the 11th day of August 1902, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 42, folio 300, to which deed reference is had for a particular description of said property.

IV

A tract or parcel of land containing one acre, more or less, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Gorman, having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry C. Stemple and wife, by deed dated the 30th day of April, 1904, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 54, folio 454. There are situated, on this property, several buildings, one of which can be used for a combination dwelling house and store building.

All of the above described property will be sold free and acquit from all liens and incumbrances. The title to all of said property is considered good.

TERMS OF SALE. One third cash in hand on day of sale and the residue upon a credit of six and twelve months, the purchaser to give interest bearing notes, with good personal security, for the deferred purchase money and the legal title to the property to be retained as additional security, until said deferred purchase money has been paid.

C. W. MAXWELL, Trustee.

Saturday, August 20th,

at 2 o'clock P. M., at the same place.

MORTGAGEE'S SALE

OF VALUABLE

Real Estate

In Garrett County, Maryland

Under and by virtue of a power of sale contained in a mortgage from Thomas J. Roy and Rebecca F. Roy, his wife, to Katharine B. Stille dated the 5th day of July, 1906, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T., No. 51, folio 79, etc., one of the Mortgage Records of Garrett County, Maryland, default having occurred under the covenants contained in said mortgage, the undersigned attorney named therein, hereby gives notice that on at the hour of 10:30 o'clock a. m., in front of the First National Bank Building in the town of Oakland, Maryland, he will offer at public auction and sell to the highest bidder, all the following described real estate, situate in Garrett county, Maryland: about three and one half miles northwest of Oakland, the same being a part of Lot No. 6 of the subdivisions of a tract of land called "William and Mary," and adjoins the farms of William H. Hardesty and Owen Macklin, and beginning for the same at an ancient planted stone standing at the end of 25⅝ perches on the 2nd line of the whole tract called "William and Mary," which is also at the end of the 1st line of said Lot No. 6 and running thence with the 2nd line thereof, North 3 degrees West, 80 perches to a planted stone marked No. 2, standing at the end of the 2nd line of William H. Hardesty's land, and reversing it West, 89 4-5 perches to the end of the 1st line of said Hardesty's land to a planted stone marked No. 1, thence South 1 degree East, 61 perches to the 1st line of said Lot No. 6, thence with it South 77 degrees East, 91 perches to the beginning, containing 38½ Acres, More or Less.

The improvements consist of a comfortable dwelling, stable and other outbuildings, a young orchard, and about one half of said land is cleared and under cultivation.

Terms of Sale, as prescribed in said mortgage—Cash on day of sale.

D. JAMES BLACKISTON,
Attorney for Mortgagee named in said Mortgage.

For further information apply to E. H. Sincell, Oakland, Maryland.

CONDITION OF OLD NATIONAL PIKE IN GARRETT

West of Frostburg, the Historic Highway Is Something Awful.

The writer was driven a few miles west of Frostburg the other day to see the road there leading into and in Garrett county. As yet, however, he has not seen the road, but only the place where the road originally was and where a new one should be built. To say that the road is in a bad condition is not to express it at all. Without any exaggeration it is safe to say that no piece of road can be found between Baltimore city and Ohio on the National pike, as the many turnpikes en route to either point can testify, that will compare with this disgraceful condition. It is a disgrace to any commonwealth and one which some one some day may be made to suffer for. This piece of road was the first to be surveyed, which was done over two years ago in midwinter and it was thought that some relief would be forthcoming ere this, but not yet

To express the frightful condition of this public thoroughfare in words is a hard task and the only way to realize the bad state of affairs existing is to attempt to travel over it. The bed of Georges creek with the water removed is about as near a comparison as can be made and one which is not overdrawn in the least. In many places it is hard to find where the original road runs since travelers have had to abandon it because of its impassable condition. Rocky and full of holes in which at some places from fifty to one hundred gallons of water can lie, one side of the road two to three feet lower than the other, is the kind of road one must travel over. At places the outcropping of the lower strata of rock must be passed over, thus making large boulders and this is also on a grade which is very ruinous to horses and vehicles.

At points where the road has had to be abandoned and a new one sought nearby the new one has been worn down from two to three feet and one traveling this way at night is apt to get on the old road and possibly fall to the newly made road (?) over a small precipice. Should an accident happen here it would be a splendid chance for a good case against Garrett county, as this condition is across the line from Allegany, where at present one and one-eighth miles of new state road is under construction coming towards Frostburg. On the hill going down to the farm of Mr. Thomas J. Johnson the worst conditions prevail. Here teams must take either side of the old National pike, the road being against telegraph poles, on about twenty of which can be seen the marks where the hubs of wagons strike although at this point the original road was thirty feet wide.

Someone is responsible for this and the remedy should be forthcoming in the not far distant future. If Garrett county values horseflesh, if they have the interest of their citizens and taxpayers at heart they should promply look after this section of their county and improve the highways entrusted to them. It can be positively stated that trade from Garrett and Allegany counties is being driven into Pennsylvania because of this state of affairs, and should not a thoroughfare over which at a given point over two hundred teams and automobiles pass in about twelve hours receive some consideration. The Big Savage mountain road is the feeder of Allegany and the outlet for Garrett for farm products and if a passable highway cannot be secured this avenue of trade is naturally going elsewhere to the detriment of both counties and the state. As this is a matter of public interest in which the interests of both counties are mutual is it not proper for those responsible to seek to rectify this public disgrace at their earliest convenience.—Cumberland News Nomination Papers Filed.

Hon. Alexander R. Hagner, of Hagerston, Washington county, spent Monday afternoon and part of Tuesday in Oakland, going from here to Mountain Lake Park, later returning to his home on account of an attack of illness. While in Oakland Mr. Hagner, in compliance with the primary election law, filed with the Board of Election Supervisors his certificate as a candidate for the Congressional nomination so that now he is a candidate in the fullest sense of the term. It was Mr. Hagner's intention to visit Accident, Bittinger, Grantsville, Friendsville, Selbysport and other points in the northern end of the county this week but owing to the illness which seized him Tuesday this was impossible. He will visit these and other points in the county, however, before election day. In Oakland Mr. Hagner met a great many voters from a number of the districts and was greatly encouraged in his fight for the nomination.

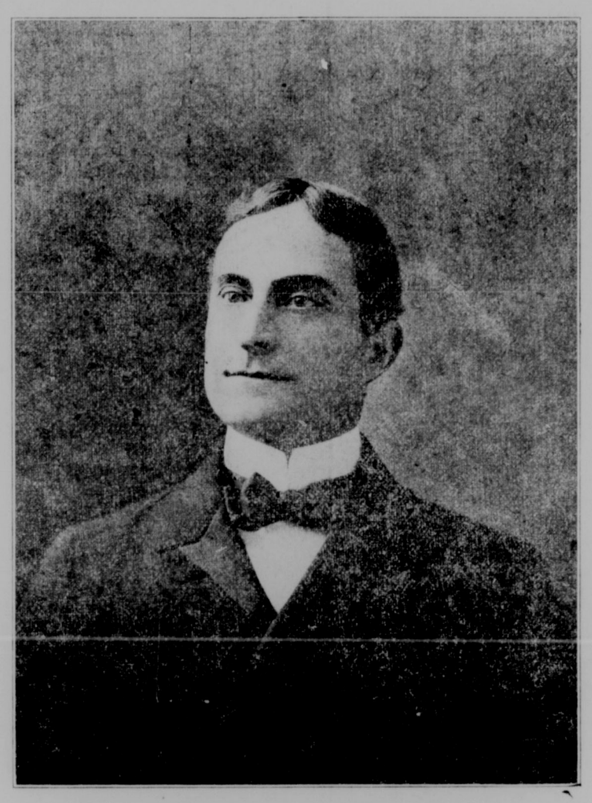
What Bad Road Did in a Small Way.

Edward Rosenberger, of Garrett county, started to town last Saturday with a half-gallon cream. When he reached here he found that the bad-road jolting had churned the cream into about a half-pound of butter. The latter, however was not in condition to sell, and there being no market for buttermilk, he lost the cream. He says the latter churned at home, would have made about three-fourth of a pound of butter, which, at 20 cents a pound would have realized 22 cents. But the bad road made his effort to market the cream a total loss.—Frostburg Journal.

More B. & O. Equipment Ordered.

It was officially announced at the Baltimore B. & O. headquarters yesterday that contracts had been awaaded for ten Mallet engines, five of which will be built by the American Locomotive Company and five by the Baldwin Locomotive Works of Philadelphia. The engines will weigh 450,000 pounds, all of which will be carried on eight pairs of driving wheels. The tractive power will be 105,000 pounds with steam pressure of 210 pounds to the cubic inch and the engines will also be equipped with superheaters. They will be used in freight service on the mountain division of the B. & O. and with the assistance of one consolidation engine will handle 1,750 tons up the western slope of the Alleghanies.

HE WANTS ANOTHER TERM IN CONGRESS.



HON. GEORGE ALEXANDER PEARRE.

HEAD CRUSHED BETWEEN BUMPERS

Young Railroader Met Horrible Fate Last Saturday Morning.

C. E. Kooken, or Cogan, of Altoona, Pa., employed as a freight brakeman on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Cumberland and Grafton, met with a horrible accident last Saturday morning at Forty Water Station, east of Swanton, on the Seventeen-mile grade, which resulted in his death before the train upon which he was employed reached Oakland.

At the water station where the accident took place the locomotive had been uncoupled from the train and when young Kooken attempted to recouple it his foot slipped and he fell forward between the pumpers just as they were coming together, his head and face being crushed to an almost unrecognizable mass.

He lived for an hour afterward, but when the train reached here he was dead and his body was taken to the undertaking rooms of Messrs. Bolden, Brown & Weimer where they were prepared for burial and an effort was made to communicate with the relatives of the deceased, but without success. The remains were interred Monday afternoon, Rev. E. Manges, of the Lutheran church, officiating.

It is thought that Kooken had assumed the name of Cogan as he is survived by a wife and two small children, from whom he had separated, and who reside at or near Altoona. He had been in the employ of the B. & O. for only two weeks.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The excursion Tuesday was not as large as had been anticipated, but was an improvement on the first excursion last season. The attendance at the amphitheatre was very good, especially in the evening when a great audience was present and seemed to enjoy the program, which was continued so long as to prevent many of the westbound excursionists from reaching their train and they were compelled to wait for a later train and then pay the regular fare.

The base ball game between the Oakland and Piedmont teams resulted in a victory for Piedmont by a score of 6 to 4.

The next excursion will be next Tuesday, the 16th, when Mr. C. P. Connolly, of Chicago, the brilliant correspondent of Collier's who brought about the Pinchot-Ballinger investigation and who is practically the father of the insurgent movement, will lecture at 11.00 a. m., on "The Insurgent movement, It's Beginnings and Purposes." At 2.30 Hon. John Temple Graves will lecture on "The Reign of the Demagogue," and at 7.30 Mr. and Mrs. Albert Gale will give an entertainment "Life and Customs Among the Japanese," with accurate and picturesqe costumes.

Saturday an excursion will come from Wildel, W. Va., provided by the Chaffey Lumber Company, for their employees and families to the number of about two hundred. A special musical program will be given for their benefit.

The annual excursion of children from Piedmont and Westernport visited the Park yesterday.

The Park has not been so crowded for six years, and still they come, and all are being comfortably entertained.

The outlook for the sale of lots and and the erection of cottages is brighter than for years.

Dr. J. W. Laughlin contemplates the erection of a cottage on his lot on G street and making this his permanent home. The Doctor and his family would be heartily welcomed by our people as permanent residents.

The sermon Sunday morning by Dr. Grant was one of the greatest ever delivered on the grounds and was listened to by a very large audience.

Dr. Henry Ostrom preached in the M. E. church Sunday night at 8.15 to an audience that crammed the church, many standing throughout the service.

The mountain excursion Monday afternoon for the benefit of the M. E. parsonage fund was participated in by about one hundred.

Services in the M. E. church next Sunday as follows: 10.00 a. m., class meeting; 2.30 p. m., Sunday School and 8.15 p. m., preaching. All invited.

Hon. Alexander R. Hagner, candidate for the congressional nomination in this district was in the Park Tuesday and Wednesday.

A great Bible Conference at Mountain Lake Park next summer is assured. It will be under the same direction as the one held this season.

Mrs. J. W. Laughlin, daughter Sada and daughter-in-law, Mrs. Frank Laughlin are attending the Chautauqua.

Rev. A. S. Arnett was here Tuesday.

Master James Frame is ill at the home of his grandmother, Mrs. Allie Haymond. Nothing serious.

Our merchants and their clerks are very busy people these days.

Natural gas has been installed in one hundred buildings and many more will use it after the close of the season.

Mr. Paul Sperry, of Baltimore, was with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Sperry, this week.

Dr. Bates McLain came to the Park last week from Wheeling by automobile.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Cuppett, of Clarksburg, W. Va., left the Park Tuesday night after spending several days in the county.

DEER PARK.

Mr. A. L. Gable, of the Real Estate Department, B. & O. R. R., spent Sunday at Deer Park.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Maddy, of New York, were callers at Uplands, Deer Park, last Sunday. Mr. Maddy is an an official of the Erie Railroad Co.

Mr. C. F. Schoolman, of Philadelphia, is a visitor at Uplands, Deer Park.

Mr. J. Fred Kriel, Jr., of Baltimore, is spending his vacation at Uplands.

Mrs. Carl Harrington, of Chelsea avenue, Walbrook, Baltimore, is spending her first summer in the mountains. She and her little son are guests at Uplands. It is needless to say that Mrs. Harrington is charmed with the delightful temperature of Garrett county.

This has been a gala week, indeed, and the throngs of visitors at the Deer Park Hotel and cottages have had full measure of enjoyment and tranquility. The temperature has been very agreeable, and cooling breezes, freighted with ozone containing health-giving properties, have prevailed every day.

Golf and tennis have absorbed the time of those who desire an abundance of sunshine and outdoor recreation, and the golf links and tennis courts have presented scenes of activity more than normal the whole time.

Col. Heyl's family, in White Oaks cottage, is entertaining Miss Hemphill, of West Chester, Pa. Miss Hemphill arrived Sunday. She is a skilled tennis participant and a popular young lady.

Mrs. Josias Pennington has invited Miss Katie Steele, of Baltimore, to pay her a visit here. Mrs. Pennington is finding life so agreeable at Deer Park that she may postpone indefinitely her proposed trip to Bar Harbor. Mrs. Pleasants, her mother, is also here.

Mrs. T. B. Davis, Jr., gave a dinner party at Cottage A, and it was a very elaborate affair. Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Kefauver and Dr. and Mrs. A. G. Wiley, of Baltimore, were among the guests. Miss Katherine Bonney, of Louisville, was also at the dinner. Miss Bonney is very attractive and is an acknowledged belle at Deer Park this season.

Mr. Harry F. Regester terminated his visit at Uplands, and returned to Baltimore. His family will remain here for the rest of the season, and will be joined next week by Mrs. Regester's mother, Mrs. J. Sewell Thomas, for the month of August.

At Red House, the summer home of Mrs. A. Nisbet Turnbull, of Baltimore, Mr. Alexander Preston, of Baltimore, is having a very pleasant visit.

Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Schenck, of New York, are being entertained at Hunting Ridge by Mr. and Mrs. James Swan Frick. The Fricks entertain generously, and Hunting Ridge is the mecca for the fashionable folk congregating at this resort. Mr. Walter Abell, of Baltimore, has also visited the Fricks recently. Mr. William F. Lucas, Jr., has returned to Baltimore.

Mr. and Mrs. William Elliott Lowes and children, of Windsor Hills, Baltimore, have concluded to remain at Deer Park for the rest of the season. They have apartments at Uplands. Mr. Lowes is looking for a suitable site upon which to build a summer cottage. Mr. and Mrs. Lowes are receiving much benefit from the delicious mountain climate.

Albert Droege and wife are at Fairview cottage.

FOR SALE Several slightly used pianos of different makes, including a Stieff upright; also some organs taken in exchange. These instruments can be seen at Oakland and Mt. Lake Park and will be sold at bargains if sold soon. Write for prices and terms to CHAS. M. STIEFF, Hagerstown, Md.

OLD SOLDIERS OF THE BLUE AND GRAY TO HAVE REUNION

Friendsville Has Been Selected as Place of Meeting.

R. E. Friend, commander of Sherman Post, G. A. R., at Friendsville, Garrett county, has advised the commander of the post here—and presumably all the posts in this county—that the reunion of veterans of the blue and the gray will be held in Friendsville on Sept. 8, 9 and 10, from Thursday to Saturday, inclusive. Post adjutants are requested to advise Commander Friend of the number of men coming, and all those desiring to engage quarters should write to Sherman Post at once.

This will be a reunion of the survivors of both armies now residing in Allegany and Garrett counties, and Mineral county, W. Va., but it is certain that there will be many veterans from the Pennsylvania towns bordering on Garrett county.

Friendsville will find comfortable quarters for all who may come, and the town is easily reached by rail from Cumberland or other points. It is expected that every G. A. R. post and Confederate camp and their auxiliaries will get busy at once and prepare to go to Friendsville with full ranks.

This will very probably be the last time the old boys will foregather this side of the Great Divide, and the Maryland soldiers will have an opportunity to meet the Pennsylvania comrades, whom they have not seen since Gettysburg or Antietam.

There will be camp fires, army pork and beans, war time fife and drum music, reunions of companies and battalions, and all the rest of it.

Newspapers in the three counties are asked to notice this reunion, and the Garrett county papers especially.—Cumberland Times, Lonaconing Correspondent.

Married.

DISTEFANO—CUZZINS—At the parsonage of Wesley M. E. church, Wheeling, W. Va., by the pastor, Rev. J. B. Workman, on Thursday, August 28th, Miss Myrtle Cuzzins, of Crellin, Garrett county, and Rev. Nicola DiStefano, Italian missionary of the Oakland District, M. E. church. The bride is a most estimable young lady and the groom is a rising young preacher of the West Virginia Conference. For the present they will reside at Buckhannon, W. Va., where Mr. DiStefano is a student in West Virginia Wesleyan College. They have the best wishes of hosts of friends for a long and happy married life.

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night, she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. She passed a terrible night, which was filled with unseemly noises. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff button in a clothes hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot. A strange man was found shot to death, in the hall. It proved to be the body of Arnold Armstrong, whose banker father owned the country house. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson and the coroner arrived. Gertrude revealed that she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she had talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson told Miss Innes that she was hiding evidence from him. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. It developed that the intruder was probably a woman. Gertrude was suspected, for the intruder left a print of a bare foot. Gertrude returned home with her right ankle sprained. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff button. Halsey suddenly reappeared. He said he and Bailey had left because they had received a telegram. Gertrude said that she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him Halsey's loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested, charged with embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong had wrecked his own bank, and was able to clear Bailey. A telegram contained news that Paul Armstrong was dead. Halsey trapped Mrs. Watson, the housekeeper, while she was stealing from the house. At the lodge Miss Innes and Halsey found Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, sister of the dead man. She was believed to be in California. The lodge keeper told Miss Innes that Louise and Arnold had had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated.

CHAPTER XIII.—Continued.

The gardener mentioned by Halsey came out about two o'clock in the afternoon, and walked up from the station. I was favorably impressed by him. His references were good—he had been employed by the Brays' until they went to Europe, and he looked young and vigorous. He asked for one assistant, and I was glad enough to get off so easily. He was a pleasant-faced young fellow, with black hair and blue eyes, and his name was Alexander Graham. I have been particular about Alex, because, as I said before, he played an important part later.

That afternoon I had a new insight into the character of the dead banker. I had my first conversation with Louise. She sent for me, and against my better judgment I went.

She held out her hand and I took it between both of mine.

"What can I say to you, Miss Innes?" she said slowly. "To have come like this—"

I thought she was going to break down, but she did not.

"You are not to think of anything but of getting well," I said, patting her hand. "When you are better, I am going to scold you for not coming here at once. This is your home, my dear, and of all people in the world, Halsey's old aunt ought to make you welcome."

She smiled a little, sadly, I thought. "I ought not to see Halsey," she said. "Miss Innes, there are a great many things you will never understand, I am afraid. I am an imposter on your sympathy, because I—I stay here and let you lavish care on me, and all the time I know you are going to despise me."

"Nonsense!" I said briskly. "Why, what would Halsey do to me if I even ventured such a thing? He is so big and masterful that if I dared to be anything but rapturous over you, he would throw me out of a window. Indeed, he would be quite capable of it."

She seemed scarcely to hear my facetious tone. She had eloquent brown eyes—the Inneses are fair, and prone to a grayish-green optic that is better for use than appearance—and they seemed now to be clouded with trouble.

"Poor Halsey!" she said softly. "Miss Innes, I cannot marry him, and I am afraid to tell him. I am a coward—a coward!"

I sat beside the bed and stared at her. She was too ill to argue with, and, besides, sick people take queer fancies.

"We will talk about that when you are stronger," I said gently.

"But there are some things I must tell you," she insisted. "You must wonder how I came here, and why I stayed hidden at the lodge. Dear old Thomas has been almost crazy, Miss Innes. I did not know that Sunnyside was rented. I knew my mother wished to rent it, without telling my—stepfather, but the news must have reached her after I left. When I started east, I had only one idea—to be alone with my thoughts for a time, to bury myself here. Then, I—must have taken a cold on the train."

"You came east in clothing suitable for California," I said, "and like all young girls nowadays, I don't suppose you wear flannels." But she was not listening.

"Miss Innes," she said, "has my stepbrother Arnold gone away?"

"What do you mean?" I asked, startled. But Louise was literal.

"He didn't come back that night," she said, "and it was so important that I should see him."

"I believe he has gone away," I replied uncertainly. "Isn't it something that we could attend to instead?"

But she shook her head. "I must do it myself," she said dully.

Halsey came to the door at that moment and I could hear him coaxing Liddy for admission to the sick room.

"Shall I bring him in?" I asked Louise, uncertain what to do. The girl seemed to shrink back among her pillows at the sound of his voice. I was vaguely irritated with her; there are few young fellows like Halsey—straightforward, honest, and willing to sacrifice everything for the one woman. I knew one once, more than 30 years ago, who was like that; he died a long time ago. And sometimes I take out his picture, with its cane and its queer silk hat, and look at it. But of late years it has grown too painful; he is always a boy—and I am an old woman. I would not bring him back if I could.

Perhaps it was some such memory that made me call out sharply.

"Come in, Halsey." And then I took my sewing and went into the boudior beyond, to play propriety. I did not try to hear what they said, but every word came through the open door with curious distinctness. Halsey had evidently gone over to the bed and I suppose he kissed her. There was silence for a moment, as if words were superfluous things.

"I have been almost wild, sweetheart,"—Halsey's voice. "Why didn't you trust me, and send for me before?"

"It was because I couldn't trust myself," she said in a low tone. "I am too weak to struggle to-day; oh, Halsey, how I have wanted to see you!"

There was something I did not hear, then Halsey again.

"We could go away," he was saying. "What does it matter about any one in the world but just the two of us? To be always together, like this, hand in hand; Louise—don't tell me it isn't going to be. I won't believe you."

"You don't know; you don't know," Louise repeated dully. "Halsey, I care—you know that—but—not enough to marry you."

"That is not true, Louise," he said sternly. "You cannot look at me with your honest eyes and say that."

"I cannot marry you," she repeated miserably. "It's bad enough, isn't it? Don't make it worse. Some day, before long, you will be glad."

"Then it is because you have never loved me." There were depths of hurt pride in his voice. "You saw how much I loved you, and you let me think you cared—for a while. No—that isn't like you, Louise. There is something you haven't told me. Is it—because there is some one else?"

"Yes," almost inaudibly.

"Louise! Oh, I don't believe it."

"It is true," she said sadly. "Halsey, you must not try to see me again. As soon as I can, I am going away from here—where you are all so much kinder than I deserve. And whatever you hear about me, try to think as well of me as you can. I am going to marry—another man. How you must hate me—hate me!"

I could hear Halsey cross the room to the window. Then, after a pause, he went back to her again. I could hardly sit still; I wanted to go in and give her good shaking.

"Then it's all over," he was saying with a long breath. "The plans we made together, the hopes, the—all of it—over! Well, I'll not be a baby, and I'll give you up the minute you say 'I don't love you and I do love—some one else!'"

"I can not say that," she breathed, "but, very soon, I shall marry—the other man."

I could hear Halsey's low triumphant laugh.

"I defy him," he said. "Sweetheart, as long as you care for me, I am not afraid."

The wind slammed the door between the two rooms just then, and I could hear nothing more, although I moved my chair quite close. After a discreet interval, I went into the other room and found Louise alone. She was staring with sad eyes at the cherub painted on the ceiling over the bed, and because she looked tired I did not disturb her.

CHAPTER XIV.

An Egg-Nog and a Telegram.

We had discovered Louise at the lodge Tuesday night. It was Wednesday I had my interview with her. Thursday and Friday were uneventful, save as they marked improvement in our patient. Gertrude spent almost all the time with her, and the two had grown to be great friends. But certain things hung over me constantly; the coroner's inquest on the death of Arnold Armstrong, to be held Saturday, and the arrival of Mrs. Armstrong and young Dr. Walker, bringing the body of the dead president of the Traders' bank. We had not told Louise of either death.

Then, too, I was anxious about the children. With their mother's inheritance swept away in the wreck of the bank, and with their love affairs in a disastrous condition, things could scarcely be worse. Added to that, the cook and Liddy had a flare up over the proper way to make beef-tea for Louise, and, of course, the cook left.

Mrs. Watson had been glad enough, I think, to turn Louise over to our care, and Thomas went upstairs night and morning to greet his young mistress from the doorway. Poor Thomas! He had the faculty—found still in some old negroes, who cling to the traditions of slavery days—of making his employer's interest his. It was always "we" with Thomas. I miss him sorely; pipe-smoking, obsequious, not over reliable, kindly old man!

On Thursday Mr. Harton, the Armstrongs' legal adviser, called up from town. He had been advised, he said, that Mrs. Armstrong was coming east with her husband's body and would arrive Monday. He came with some hesitation, at last, to the fact that he had been further instructed to ask me to relinquish my lease on Sunnyside, as it was Mrs. Armstrong's desire to come directly there.

I was aghast.

"Here!" I said. "Surely you are mistaken, Mr. Harton. I should think, after—what happened here only a few days ago, she would never wish to come back."

"Nevertheless," he replied, "she is most anxious to come. This is what she says: 'Use every possible means to have Sunnyside vacated. Must go there at once.'"

"Mr. Harton," I said testily, "I am not going to do anything of the kind. I and mine have suffered enough at the hands of this family. I rented the house at an exorbitant figure and I have moved out here for the summer. My city home is dismantled and in the hands of decorators. I have been here one week, during which I have had not a single night of uninterrupted sleep, and I intend to stay until I have recuperated. Moreover, if Mr. Armstrong died insolvent, as I believe was the case, his widow ought to be glad to be rid of so expensive a piece of property."

The lawyer cleared his throat.

"I am very sorry you have made this decision," he said. "Miss Innes, Mrs. Fitzhugh tells me Louise Armstrong is with you."

"She is."

"Has she been informed of this—double bereavement?"

"Not yet," I said. "She has been very ill; perhaps to-night she can be told."

"It is very sad; very sad," he said. "I have a telegram for her, Miss Innes. Shall I send it out?"

"Better open it and read it to me," I suggested. "If it is important, that will save time."

There was a pause while Mr. Harton opened the telegram. Then he read it slowly, judicially.

"'Watch for Nina Carrington. Home Monday. Signed F. L. W.'"

"Hum!" I said. "'Watch for Nina Carrington. Home Monday.' Very well, Mr. Harton, I will tell her, but she is not in condition to watch for any one."

"Well, Miss Innes, if you decide to—er—relinquish the lease, let me know," the lawyer said.

"I shall not relinquish it," I replied, and I imagined his irritation from the way he hung up the receiver.

I wrote the telegram down word for word, afraid to trust my memory, and decided to ask Dr. Stewart how soon Louise might be told the truth. The closing of the Traders' bank I considered unnecessary for her to know, but the death of her stepfather and stepbrother must be broken to her soon, or she might hear it in some unexpected and shocking manner.

Dr. Stewart came about four o'clock, bringing his leather satchel into the house with a great deal of care, and opening it at the foot of the stairs to show me a dozen big yellow eggs nesting among the bottles.

"Real eggs," he said proudly. "None of your anemic store eggs, but the real thing—some of them still warm. Feel them! Egg-nog for Miss Louise!"

He was beaming with satisfaction, and before he left, he insisted on going back to the pantry and making an egg-nog with his own hands. Somehow, all the time he was doing it, I had a vision of Dr. Willoughby, my nerve specialist in the city, trying to make an egg-nog. I wondered if he ever prescribed anything so plebeian—and so delicious. And while Dr. Stewart whisked the eggs he talked.

"I said to Mrs. Stewart," he confided, a little red in the face from the exertion, "after I went home the other day, that you would think me an old gossip, for saying what I did about Walker and Miss Louise."

"Nothing of the sort," I protested.

"The fact is," he went on, evidently justifying himself, "I got that piece of information just as we get a lot of things, through the kitchen end of the house. Young Walker's chauffeur—Walker's more fashionable than I am, and he goes around the country in a Stanhope car—well, his chauffeur comes to see our servant girl, and he told her the whole thing. I thought it was probable, because Walker spent a lot of time up here last summer, when the family was here, and besides, Riggs, that's Walker's man, had a very pat little story about the doctor's building a house on this property, just at the foot of the hill. The sugar, please."

The egg-nog was finished. Drop by drop the liquor had cooked the egg, and now, with a final whisk, a last toss in the shaker, it was ready, a symphony in gold and white. The doctor sniffed it.

"Real eggs, real milk, and a touch of real Kentucky whisky," he said.

He insisted on carrying it up himself, but at the foot of the stairs he paused.

"Riggs said the plans were drawn for the house," he said, harking back to the old subject. "Drawn by Huston in town. So I naturally believed him."

When the doctor came down, I was ready with a question.

"Doctor," I asked, "is there any one in the neighborhood named Carrington? Nina Carrington?"

"Carrington?" He wrinkled his forehead. "Carrington? No, I don't remember any such family. There used to be Covingtons down the creek."

"The name was Carrington," I said and the subject lapsed.

SCRATCHED SO SHE COULD NOT SLEEP

"I write to tell you how thankful I am for the wonderful Cuticura Remedies. My little niece had eczema for five years and when her mother died I took care of the child. It was all over her face and body, also on her head. She scratched so that she could not sleep nights. I used Cuticura Soap to wash her with and then applied Cuticura Ointment. I did not use quite half the Cuticura Soap and Ointment, together with Cuticura Resolvent, when you could see a change and they cured her nicely. Now she is eleven years old and has never been bothered with eczema since. My friends think it is just great the way the baby was cured by Cuticura. I send you a picture taken when she was about 18 months old.

"She was taken with the eczema when two years old. She was covered with big sores and her mother had all the best doctors and tried all kinds of salves and medicines without effect until we used Cuticura Remedies. Mrs. H. Kiernan, 663 Quincy St., Brooklyn, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1909."

Judges' Wigs.

The wig is only worn by English barristers to give them a stern judicial appearance, and no one can say that it fails in this respect. The custom was originated by a French judge in the seventeenth century when, happening to don a marquis' wig one day, he found it gave him such a stern and dignified appearance that he decided to get one for himself and wear it at all times in court. This he did, and the result was so satisfactory from a legal point of view, that not only judges, but barristers, also, took up the custom throughout Europe.

A Real Argument.

They were talking about argument, not in the abstract, but as applying to domestic happiness. "What do you think is the most unanswerable argument you ever heard?" one bachelor asked a married man.

"That's very easy," he replied. "When your wife says, 'If they can afford it, we can,' there is no flaw in that—and never will be."—Youth's Companion.

Elbert Hubbard on Suffering.

Elbert Hubbard, editor of the Philistine, says: "Most of the suffering in this life comes from too much work, or too little." He could have left off that "too little," and he would have left it off had he referred to wash-day suffering. There has been too much work on wash day for the women, but now we have Easy Task soap that does the work easily, quickly, cleanly and surely—and does half the work all by itself. It is the cleanest, purest, white laundry soap made and sold at five cents a cake.

Freedom doesn't always bring happiness, but you'll notice that it is the tied dog that howls.

Finding Fighters for Uncle Sam

By EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W.A. PATTERSON

HE war department is trying to find ways and means to increase the number of cadets at the United States Military academy. Since the Spanish war, when the army was enlarged, there have not been anywhere near enough graduates to fill the vacancies in the commissioned ranks of the army. The result has been that not only has it been necessary to promote to the rank of second lieutenant, enlisted men of the army who can pass the required examination, but to appoint each year to the service large numbers of civilians.

Naturally enough the war department officials feel that the commissioned officers should be men educated to the profession of a soldier. There seems to be a pretty general feeling, one hard for the authorities to account for by the way, that every man is born a soldier and that the military profession is the only one for which no special training is required. Gen. Winfield Scott, at the close of the Mexican war, said that if it had not been for the officers of his army who were graduates of the military academy the war would have been prolonged for years. This praise of the institution and the men whom it turns out was given by a man not a graduate, and who, therefore, could not be said to be prejudiced in favor of the institution.

The course at West Point is a particularly hard one and a good many cadets are found deficient every year, generally in only one study. West Point, however, differs from all other schools of the world. There they do not strike an average of studies, taking all the lessons taught in a lump. For instance, if a man stands at the head of his class in four studies, but is a little bit below the proficient average in one study, the authorities throw him out, whereas in other schools they would strike an average and give such a man a high standing.

The result of such a system as this is that men who are qualified for the service in practically every way, but who may be a little lame in French or a trifle off in geology or chemistry, are separated from the army to which they might possibly be a credit if an average of excellence was struck by the authorities.

It is quite often the case that men who do not graduate but who have had several years' training at the academy succeed in getting commissions in the service. There are no records to show that any man who spent two years at West Point failed to pass his examination for a commission after he had been successful in getting an appointment to the army from civil life.

Some of the boys who have been at West Point, but have not graduated, enlisted in the United States army in order to get their commission from the ranks. When a man does so enlist he may be sent as a private soldier to a company in which some classmate is a lieutenant. Now it must be remembered that there is a deep gulf between officers and enlisted men in the regular army, a gulf which it is necessary to have remain fixed, because familiarity of intercourse between officers and enlisted men would lead to lax discipline. It is not the case, as some people seem to think, of an officer being too proud to associate with enlisted men. The officers of the army hold the enlisted men in high esteem. They know that they are the backbone of the army and they know that on their loyalty, obedience and courage hangs success in war and the credit of the army in peace. Every army in the world has learned the lesson that there must be a lack of familiar intercourse in a social way between the commissioned officers and the enlisted men.

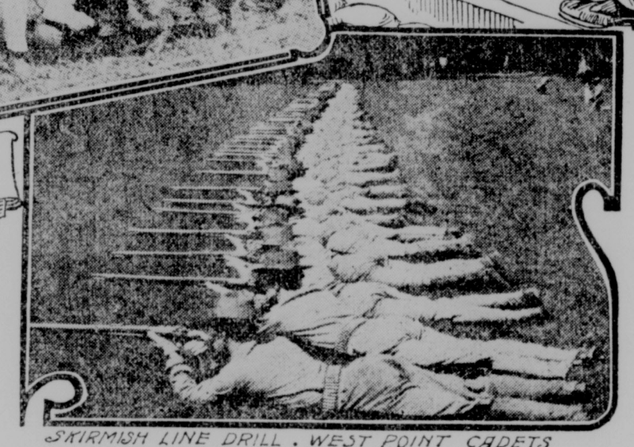
When a young fellow who has been at West Point enlists he is likely, as has been said, to get into a command in which one of his classmates may be an officer. Then it is that a curious relation results. The enlisted man meets his former classmate, whom he once called Bill or Jim and with whom he possibly roomed as a cadet, and he must simply salute him as any other enlisted man would, and pass without a sign of "familiar recognition." Now this does not mean at all that Jim or Bill does not want to speak to his former classmate. It means simply that the enlisted man wants to preserve his own standing with his fellow soldiers and does not want to put his former classmate by and chance in an embarrassing position. If the enlisted men should learn that their newly enlisted fellow was a former classmate and a friend of one of the officers they might think that it was going to be a case of currying favor on the one side or of showing favor on the other. The man who is once a cadet and who enlists is more careful if he is built right, and he generally is, to maintain a proper attitude toward the men who rank him.

They tell a story in Washington of a young fellow who came of rich parentage, but who never had been at West Point, by the way, who enlisted in the army to get his commission. He attempted to presume on the fact of his wealth and he not only got the officers down on him, but the men as well. His lot was not altogether a happy one. It can be said, however, that cases like that of this young man are few and far between. The man who is willing to enlist in order to get his commission, generally speaking, is of good stuff enough to make him willing to take things as they come and to take rather more than his share of the duties and the hardships of the enlisted men with whom he is thrown.

There was once upon a time a cadet who, having spent time enough at the United States Military academy to cover a considerable part of the course, was compelled by the government to sever his connection with the school he had hoped would prove to him a fostering mother until the end.

This cadet, who shall be nameless because of a modest desire to avoid the use of the pronoun in the first person, had a yearning for military life, and so a few years after leaving the academy he walked into a Boston recruiting office and enlisted. Several classmates and several other army friends knew of the enlistment and told the enlisted one prior to his application for admission to the service to strike out for a commission, and, above all things, not to let any of the enlisted men, or any of the officers who did not know him, have knowledge of the fact that he had been at the military academy, for otherwise they might think he expected favors.

The advice was needless, for whatever else the recruit intended to do he desired that his service should be performed on the same level with that of every other man in the United States army, but the truth is that this determination and its carrying out led to some complications that had humor enough at the time even though they lose the humor because of lack of power in the story-teller.



SKIRMISH LINE DRILL . WEST POINT CADETS

This cadet recruit was landed at David's island, New York harbor, where there were 700 other recruits undergoing instruction, and a green lot they were. The cadet was turned out for squad drill with five other recruits, not one of whom knew enough about soldiering to keep his heels together. A tall, raw-boned Irish sergeant with the euphonious name of O'Baldwin was in command of the squad. He began to explain the position of a soldier. He found that the recruit on the right of the line already was in the position of a soldier. The truth was he couldn't help himself.

O'Baldwin eyed him critically. "Fall out!" he said.

The one-time cadet fell out. "What regiment did ye desart from?" said O'Baldwin, pleasantly.

"This is my first enlistment," answered the recruit, and in answering he told the truth, for a cadet isn't enlisted.

"What company are ye in?" asked O'Baldwin, though he knew perfectly well, for his own bunk was not three bunks removed from that of the recruit.

"D company," answered the queried one, and that's where he made the mistake of his life.

That apparently simple answer proved conclusively to the sergeant's mind that he had an ex-regular before him, for all the national guardsmen would have answered "Company D" instead of "D company." The regular who would speak of his command as "Company D" would be considered deserving of the guardhouse for a month, for to put the letter after the company save when it is written is to the army man the height of things unmilitary.

"You go to your quarters; we'll look into this," said the sergeant.

The recruit went to his quarters and half an hour later the first sergeant of the outfit sent for him. The "Top" opened the conversation cheerfully with a query as to what regiment the recruit had left in the lurch. Finding that he was bound to be considered a deserter, the unhappy one took the bull by the horns thus: "I am serving my first enlistment in the army; I never was in the marine corps and I never saw the inside of a national guard armory."

"Ever been in one of them private military schools?" asked the "Top."

"Never."

"Go to your quarters."

In another hour the recruit was given a rifle and cartridge box and belt and was ordered to turn out with the squad of recruits who had advanced far enough in the school of the soldier to receive lessons in the manual of arms. Now as a matter of fact the recruit knew the manual of arms so well he couldn't have hidden his knowledge if he had tried. This time there was another sergeant in charge. His eye took in the way the recruit on the right handled his piece and executed the manual.

In less than a minute the sergeant ordered him who was showing such proficiency to step to the front, and ordered "place rest" for the remainder of the squad. Then turning his attention to his victim, he said: "We'll try the bayonet exercise a bit. Guard!"

The recruit came down to "a guard" possibly with as much precision and in probably as proper style as the veteran sergeant had ever seen it done.

"Passing yourself off for a recruit. It's a fraud you are. Get to your quarters." And the recruit went to his bunk again, knowing that he was in deep disgrace.

About half an hour later he heard two old soldiers talking outside of the barracks window. One of them said to the other: "There's a cuss in there who ain't never been in the marine corps, nor in the militshy, nor in the reg'lars, nor to one of them military schools. The sergeant says he's either a blankety-blank liar or else he larnt his soldierin' from books, which ain't likely."

That night just after "tattoo," the first sergeant appeared and told the recruit that the company commander wanted to see him at once in the orderly room. The recruit went to the presence of the commissioned officer and stood attention as he had stood attention as a cadet a thousand times before. The captain looked him up and down. "I understand," he said, "that this is your first enlistment; that you have never been a national guard; that you have never been a marine and that you never attended a private military school."

The recruit acquiesced with a respectful "Yes, sir."

"About face."

The recruit made an about face, and then at a repetition of the command, again faced the captain, who was grinning.

"Go to your quarters," said the commanding officer.

The recruit went and in ten minutes the top sergeant was there, saying: "You can't fool the old man. You've been made a lance corporal and you go on guard as corporal of the third relief tomorrow morning."

There are a good many officers in the United States army today who served for a while at the military academy as cadets, but who were compelled to stay five years at the academy in order to get their commissions, having been "turned back" into the class next below them either for deficiency in studies or for breaches of discipline. If General Sheridan had not been given another chance after he had engaged in a little affair which was considered a breach of discipline while he was a cadet the wonder is who would have been the right-hand cavalry leader of Grant during the Civil war.

A few months ago Gen. Hamilton S. Hawkins died. He entered the military academy some time prior to the opening of the Civil war, but the authorities did not allow him to graduate. Hawkins was not discouraged by the failure and as soon as the Civil war broke out he offered his services to his country and was given a commission. He staid in the regular army until the time of his death and so strong was his love of the military academy that before his death he asked that he might be buried in the cadet cemetery. It was Hawkins' custom each year when he could get away from his command to visit the school where he had spent three years of his boyhood. He had just as strong a love for the institution as did any graduate in the army.

Recently there has been a disposition on the part of the graduates of the military academy to give more consideration to the men who spent some time at the school, but who did not graduate. One class organization includes in its membership all the cadets who at any time were members of the class, and no distinction is made between graduate and non-graduate, even the offices of the organization being open to men who did not complete the course.

Other class organizations are said to be preparing to follow the example of that of the members of 1884 and if the custom of taking into full brotherhood the non-graduates becomes general the belief is that good will come to the academy and the country.

Statue of Liberty Grafters

If the visitors who paid good money to a soldier for the privilege of climbing up the steps of the statue of Liberty had only known about the sixty-second article of war they never would have graduated from the deadhead class on a reservation belonging to Uncle Sam, the New York Herald says. As it is, under the last general order from the war department two soldiers who levied tribute are doomed to penal servitude for their speculative enterprise.

According to the army orders, Axel T. Holm, a first-class private of G company, signal corps, and Edward A. Bagnall, of the same grade and command, organized a syndicate for the exploitation of the French evidence of friendship for America, which, following the actual language of the order, operated, as to Holm, after this fashion:

"He, the said Holm, did designedly and fraudulently obtain money from certain visitors to the statue of liberty, fees for the privilege of going up into said statue, by knowingly making false pretenses that such fees were necessary."

And as to the enterprising Bagnall:

"That he did knowingly assist in fraudulently obtaining money from visitors to the statue of Liberty by acting as a 'lookout' with the duty of actually giving warning to the man collecting the fees in case an officer were approaching."

All of this, according to the charges and specifications upon which conviction was made, and approval then passed, violated the sixty-second article of war. In the case of Holm the department orders his dishonorable discharge and his confinement for two years at Fort Leavenworth. Bagnall gets off with reduction to the grade of private, four months' confinement and the forfeiture of $13 a month. He will work his sentence out around the base of the statue, cleaning up such litter as the tributless visitors see fit to make.

The evidence showed that the two men arranged a scheme to tax all visitors ten cents a head for the pleasure of climbing to the head of the goddess, with the ever-burning torch, and the story was printed exclusively in the Herald at the time. While one of them took in the toll the other lingered about to give the collector a tip if an officer chanced to be bearing down upon the post exchange. Capt. D. J. Carr, commanding the post, is very pr ud of this pretty show station, and he broke up the game just as soon as he found what was in the air.

STREET TRAFFIC OF PARIS.

There are nearly half a million horses and motor vehicles of all kinds in Paris today, with 20,000 hand carts and 9,000 wheelbarrows. In 1909 [illegible],870 accidents were caused in the Paris streets by 81,868 vehicles. These statistics are contained in a report drawn up by M. Emile Massard at the request of the Paris municipal council on the incumberment of the Paris streets. One of M. Massard's calculations shows that the street traffic of Paris, if stationary, would occupy 445 acres of the 2,079 acres of streets which Paris possesses. Last year 600,000,000 persons traveled by omnibuse and tramway, and there were 294,000,000 passengers on the underground railway.—Indianapolis News

AN INSURANCE EXCEPTION.

"Now," said the chronic quoter, "a man is known by the company he keeps."

"Say, I'm an insurance policy holder! Please don't class me with the company I keep."

Merely a Prevaricator.

A doctor relates the following story: "I had a patient who was very ill and who ought to have gone to a warmer climate, so I resolved to try what hypnotism would do for him. I had a large sun painted on the ceiling of his room and by suggestion induced him to think it was the sun which would cure him. The ruse succeeded and he was getting better rapidly when one day on my arrival I found he was dead."

"Did it fail, after all, then?" asked one of the doctor's hearers.

"No," replied the doctor, "he died of sunstroke."

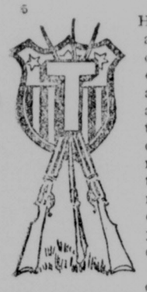
Finding Fighters for Uncle Sam

By EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W.A. PATTERSON



HE war department is trying to find ways and means to increase the number of cadets at the United States Military academy. Since the Spanish war, when the army was enlarged, there have not been anywhere near enough graduates to fill the vacancies in the commissioned ranks of the army. The result has been that not only has it been necessary to promote to the rank of second lieutenant, enlisted men of the army who can pass the required examination, but to appoint each year to the service large numbers of civilians.

Naturally enough the war department officials feel that the commissioned officers should be men educated to the profession of a soldier. There seems to be a pretty general feeling, one hard for the authorities to account for by the way, that every man is born a soldier and that the military profession is the only one for which no special training is required. Gen. Winfield Scott, at the close of the Mexican war, said that if it had not been for the officers of his army who were graduates of the military academy the war would have been prolonged for years. This praise of the institution and the men whom it turns out was given by a man not a graduate, and who, therefore, could not be said to be prejudiced in favor of the institution.

The course at West Point is a particularly hard one and a good many cadets are found deficient every year, generally in only one study. West Point, however, differs from all other schools of the world. There they do not strike an average of studies, taking all the lessons taught in a lump. For instance, if a man stands at the head of his class in four studies, but is a little bit below the proficient average in one study, the authorities throw him out, whereas in other schools they would strike an average and give such a man a high standing.

The result of such a system as this is that men who are qualified for the service in practically every way, but who may be a little lame in French or a trifle off in geology or chemistry, are separated from the army to which they might possibly be a credit if an average of excellence was struck by the authorities.

It is quite often the case that men who do not graduate but who have had several years' training at the academy succeed in getting commissions in the service. There are no records to show that any man who spent two years at West Point failed to pass his examination for a commission after he had been successful in getting an appointment to the army from civil life.

Some of the boys who have been at West Point, but have not graduated, enlisted in the United States army in order to get their commission from the ranks. When a man does so enlist he may be sent as a private soldier to a company in which some classmate is a lieutenant. Now it must be remembered that there is a deep gulf between officers and enlisted men in the regular army, a gulf which it is necessary to have remain fixed, because familiarity of intercourse between officers and enlisted men would lead to lax discipline. It is not the case, as some people seem to think, of an officer being too proud to associate with enlisted men. The officers of the army hold the enlisted men in high esteem. They know that they are the backbone of the army and they know that on their loyalty, obedience and courage hangs success in war and the credit of the army in peace. Every army in the world has learned the lesson that there must be a lack of familiar intercourse in a social way between the commissioned officers and the enlisted men.

When a young fellow who has been at West Point enlists he is likely, as has been said, to get into a command in which one of his classmates may be an officer. Then it is that a curious relation results. The enlisted man meets his former classmate, whom he once called Bill or Jim and with whom he possibly roomed as a cadet, and he must simply salute him as any other enlisted man would, and pass without a sign of "familiar recognition." Now this does not mean at all that Jim or Bill does not want to speak to his former classmate. It means simply that the enlisted man wants to preserve his own standing with his fellow soldiers and does not want to put his former classmate by and chance in an embarrassing position. If the enlisted men should learn that their newly enlisted fellow was a former classmate and a friend of one of the officers they might think that it was going to be a case of currying favor on the one side or of showing favor on the other. The man who is once a cadet and who enlists is more careful if he is built right, and he generally is, to maintain a proper attitude toward the men who rank him.

They tell a story in Washington of a young fellow who came of rich parentage, but who never had been at West Point, by the way, who enlisted in the army to get his commission. He attempted to presume on the fact of his wealth and he not only got the officers down on him, but the men as well. His lot was not altogether a happy one. It can be said, however, that cases like that of this young man are few and far between. The man who is willing to enlist in order to get his commission, generally speaking, is of good stuff enough to make him willing to take things as they come and to take rather more than his share of the duties and the hardships of the enlisted men with whom he is thrown.

There was once upon a time a cadet who, having spent time enough at the United States Military academy to cover a considerable part of the course, was compelled by the government to sever his connection with the school he had hoped would prove to him a fostering mother until the end.

This cadet, who shall be nameless because of a modest desire to avoid the use of the pronoun in the first person, had a yearning for military life, and so a few years after leaving the academy he walked into a Boston recruiting office and enlisted. Several classmates and several other army friends knew of the enlistment and told the enlisted one prior to his application for admission to the service to strike out for a commission, and, above all things, not to let any of the enlisted men, or any of the officers who did not know him, have knowledge of the fact that he had been at the military academy, for otherwise they might think he expected favors.

The advice was needless, for whatever else the recruit intended to do he desired that his service should be performed on the same level with that of every other man in the United States army, but the truth is that this determination and its carrying out led to some complications that had humor enough at the time even though they lose the humor because of lack of power in the story-teller.

This cadet recruit was landed at David's island, New York harbor, where there were 700 other recruits undergoing instruction, and a green lot they were. The cadet was turned out for squad drill with five other recruits, not one of whom knew enough about soldiering to keep his heels together. A tall, raw-boned Irish sergeant with the euphonious name of O'Baldwin was in command of the squad. He began to explain the position of a soldier. He found that the recruit on the right of the line already was in the position of a soldier. The truth was he couldn't help himself.

O'Baldwin eyed him critically. "Fall out!" he said.

The one-time cadet fell out. "What regiment did ye desart from?" said O'Baldwin, pleasantly.

"This is my first enlistment," answered the recruit, and in answering he told the truth, for a cadet isn't enlisted.

"What company are ye in?" asked O'Baldwin, though he knew perfectly well, for his own bunk was not three bunks removed from that of the recruit.

"D company," answered the queried one, and that's where he made the mistake of his life.

That apparently simple answer proved conclusively to the sergeant's mind that he had an ex-regular before him, for all the national guardsmen would have answered "Company D" instead of "D company." The regular who would speak of his command as "Company D" would be considered deserving of the guardhouse for a month, for to put the letter after the company save when it is written is to the army man the height of things unmilitary.

"You go to your quarters; we'll look into this," said the sergeant.

The recruit went to his quarters and half an hour later the first sergeant of the outfit sent for him. The "Top" opened the conversation cheerfully with a query as to what regiment the recruit had left in the lurch. Finding that he was bound to be considered a deserter, the unhappy one took the bull by the horns thus: "I am serving my first enlistment in the army; I never was in the marine corps and I never saw the inside of a national guard armory."

"Ever been in one of them private military schools?" asked the "Top."

"Never."

"Go to your quarters."

In another hour the recruit was given a rifle and cartridge box and belt and was ordered to turn out with the squad of recruits who had advanced far enough in the school of the soldier to receive lessons in the manual of arms. Now as a matter of fact the recruit knew the manual of arms so well he couldn't have hidden his knowledge if he had tried. This time there was another sergeant in charge. His eye took in the way the recruit on the right handled his piece and executed the manual.

In less than a minute the sergeant ordered him who was showing such proficiency to step to the front, and ordered "place rest" for the remainder of the squad. Then turning his attention to his victim, he said: "We'll try the bayonet exercise a bit. Guard!"

The recruit came down to "a guard" possibly with as much precision and in probably as proper style as the veteran sergeant had ever seen it done.

"Passing yourself off for a recruit. It's a fraud you are. Get to your quarters." And the recruit went to his bunk again, knowing that he was in deep disgrace.

About half an hour later he heard two old soldiers talking outside of the barracks window. One of them said to the other: "There's a cuss in there who ain't never been in the marine corps, nor in the militshy, nor in the reg'lars, nor to one of them military schools. The sergeant says he's either a blankety-blank liar or else he larnt his soldierin' from books, which ain't likely."

That night just after "tattoo," the first sergeant appeared and told the recruit that the company commander wanted to see him at once in the orderly room. The recruit went to the presence of the commissioned officer and stood attention as he had stood attention as a cadet a thousand times before. The captain looked him up and down. "I understand," he said, "that this is your first enlistment; that you have never been a national guard; that you have never been a marine and that you never attended a private military school."

The recruit acquiesced with a respectful "Yes, sir."

"About face."

The recruit made an about face, and then at a repetition of the command, again faced the captain, who was grinning.

"Go to your quarters," said the commanding officer.

The recruit went and in ten minutes the top sergeant was there, saying: "You can't fool the old man. You've been made a lance corporal and you go on guard as corporal of the third relief tomorrow morning."

There are a good many officers in the United States army today who served for a while at the military academy as cadets, but who were compelled to stay five years at the academy in order to get their commissions, having been "turned back" into the class next below them either for deficiency in studies or for breaches of discipline. If General Sheridan had not been given another chance after he had engaged in a little affair which was considered a breach of discipline while he was a cadet the wonder is who would have been the right-hand cavalry leader of Grant during the Civil war.

A few months ago Gen. Hamilton S. Hawkins died. He entered the military academy some time prior to the opening of the Civil war, but the authorities did not allow him to graduate. Hawkins was not discouraged by the failure and as soon as the Civil war broke out he offered his services to his country and was given a commission. He staid in the regular army until the time of his death and so strong was his love of the military academy that before his death he asked that he might be buried in the cadet cemetery. It was Hawkins' custom each year when he could get away from his command to visit the school where he had spent three years of his boyhood. He had just as strong a love for the institution as did any graduate in the army.

Recently there has been a disposition on the part of the graduates of the military academy to give more consideration to the men who spent some time at the school, but who did not graduate. One class organization includes in its membership all the cadets who at any time were members of the class, and no distinction is made between graduate and non-graduate, even the offices of the organization being open to men who did not complete the course.

Other class organizations are said to be preparing to follow the example of that of the members of 1884 and if the custom of taking into full brotherhood the non-graduates becomes general the belief is that good will come to the academy and the country.

Statue of Liberty Grafters

If the visitors who paid good money to a soldier for the privilege of climbing up the steps of the statue of Liberty had only known about the sixty-second article of war they never would have graduated from the dead-head class on a reservation belonging to Uncle Sam, the New York Herald says. As it is, under the last general order from the war department two soldiers who levied tribute are doomed to penal servitude for their speculative enterprise.

According to the army orders, Axel T. Holm, a first-class private of G company, signal corps, and Edward A. Bagnall, of the same grade and command, organized a syndicate for the exploitation of the French evidence of friendship for America, which, following the actual language of the order, operated, as to Holm, after this fashion:

"He, the said Holm, did designedly and fraudulently obtain money from certain visitors to the statue of liberty, fees for the privilege of going up into said statue, by knowingly making false pretenses that such fees were necessary."

And as to the enterprising Bagnall:

"That he did knowingly assist in fraudulently obtaining money from visitors to the statue of Liberty by acting as a 'lookout' with the duty of actually giving warning to the man collecting the fees in case an officer were approaching."

All of this, according to the charges and specifications upon which conviction was made, and approval then passed, violated the sixty-second article of war. In the case of Holm the department orders his dishonorable discharge and his confinement for two years at Fort Leavenworth. Bagnall gets off with reduction to the grade of private, four months' confinement and the forfeiture of $13 a month. He will work his sentence out around the base of the statue, cleaning up such litter as the tributless visitors see fit to make.

The evidence showed that the two men arranged a scheme to tax all visitors ten cents a head for the pleasure of climbing to the head of the goddess, with the ever-burning torch, and the story was printed exclusively in the Herald at the time. While one of them took in the toll the other lingered about to give the collector a tip if an officer chanced to be bearing down upon the post exchange. Capt. D. J. Carr, commanding the post, is very pr ud of this pretty show station, and he broke up the game just as soon as he found what was in the air.

STREET TRAFFIC OF PARIS.

There are nearly half a million horses and motor vehicles of all kinds in Paris today, with 20,000 hand carts and 9,000 wheelbarrows. In 1909 65,870 accidents were caused in the Paris streets by 81,868 vehicles. These statistics are contained in a report drawn up by M. Emile Massard at the request of the Paris municipal council on the incumberment of the Paris streets. One of M. Massard's calculations shows that the street traffic of Paris, if stationary, would occupy 445 acres of the 2,079 acres of streets which Paris possesses. Last year 600,000,000 persons traveled by omnibuse and tramway, and there were 294,000,000 passengers on the underground railway.—Indianapolis News.

AN INSURANCE EXCEPTION.

"Now," said the chronic quoter, "a man is known by the company he keeps."

"Say, I'm an insurance policy holder! Please don't class me with the company I keep."

Merely a Prevaricator.

A doctor relates the following story: "I had a patient who was very ill and who ought to have gone to a warmer climate, so I resolved to try what hypnotism would do for him. I had a large sun painted on the ceiling of his room and by suggestion induced him to think it was the sun which would cure him. The ruse succeeded and he was getting better rapidly when one day on my arrival I found he was dead."

"Did it fail, after all, then?" asked one of the doctor's hearers.

"No," replied the doctor, "he died of sunstroke."

THURSDAY, AUGUST 11, 1910.

FOR CONGRESS.

To the voters of the 6th Congressional District:

I desire to announce my candidacy for the Republican nomination for Congress at the forthcoming primaries, which will be held on August 30th. I will appreciate the active support of all Republicans.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR.,
Kensington, Md.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for Congress subject to the decision of the Republican primaries to be held on August 30th.

GEORGE A. PEARRE,
Cumberland.

I hereby announce my candidacy for Congress from the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, subject to the decision of the Republican primaries to be held on August 30th.

ALEXANDER R. HAGNER,
Hagerstown.

ALEXANDER R. HAGNER.

The time is near at hand when the Republicans of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland must decide who they will nominate for Congress. On August the 30th, the day set apart by the Legislature of 1910 for the voters of both parties to make their choice, will be the first time in the history of Maryland that nomination for Congress must be made directly by the people. There will be no delegates elected and no nominating convention to determine who shall represent this District in the House of Congress, and the entire responsibility, therefor, will be with the people. The condition throughout this District demands the most careful and thoughtful action on the part of the Republicans in making a selection for Congress. The man to be nominated must be the strongest one possible of those whose names, thus far, have been mentioned. He must be able to represent the District intelligently, he must unite the party, and he must have resided long enough in the Sixth Maryland District to enable him to fully understand the wishes and needs of the people.

THE REPUBLICAN has not been over hasty in rushing to the endorsement of any one candidate, but has spent much time and thought weighing the merits of each aspirant. Believing that the selection of a candidate who could fully measure up to the necessary requisites of a Congressman was more important than the cause of any one man, and realizing that the election of a Republican this fall was most essential to the welfare of the National Republican Party and the country at large, it is the duty of every Republican in the Sixth District to consider carefully the worth of each one of the candidates and to cast their vote at the primary election accordingly. THE REPUBLICAN has viewed the field from every standpoint, willing at all times to listen to the claims of the respective candidates, and with but one purpose, namely, to secure the best and strongest man to put against the Democracy in November. After a most thorough and careful consideration of candidates by the Republicans on the 30th inst., THE REPUBLICAN believes that the strongest, the most available and the one who will best unite the party is the Hon. Alex. R. Hagner of Washington county, Maryland.

Mr. Hagner has been prominent in Sixth District Republican politics for a quarter of a century. He is a lawyer of ability, a man of pure and honest motives, about whom nothing but praise can be said. He will unite the party to a man and will carry the the Sixth Maryland District, if nominated, by an old time Republican majority.

THE REPUBLICAN believing these things true does hereby unconditionally endorse the candidacy of Mr. Hagner and will from this time forth place his name in its editorial columns and use every fair means possible to convince the Republicans of Garrett county and those of all other counties in this District to come to the same conclusion. We have personally known him for more than twenty years and believe the Republicans will make no mistake in sending him to the 62nd Congress of the United States. He will make an ideal candidate and representative. Let the Republicans come out in force on the 30th of August and nominate him and they will, in the opinion of THE REPUBLICAN, be performing a duty which they will never regret.

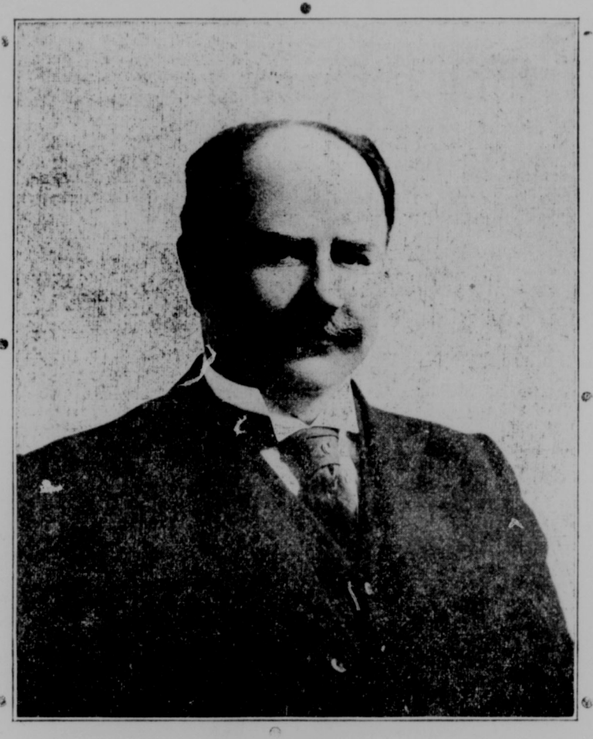
REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR CONGRESS



HON. ALEXANDER RANDALL HAGNER

And some of the laws he will endeavor to have passed if elected:

1st. If elected to Congress I will put forth every effort I possess to have Congress take over the old National Pike from Baltimore to Springfield, Ill., the place where Lincoln began his career from which he was made President of the United States, making this road a great military and post road.

2nd. I believe in a national divorce law applicable to the entire country, and will strive to have one enacted, and that evidence in all cases shall be taken in open court. The idea that any one shall be permitted to move from any state to Reno, Nev., or any other western city, acquire residence in six months and then file a bill against husband or wife with only a few weeks notice in some local paper and obtain a decree separating one another is an outrage. This is striking at the very foundation of one of our most sacred institutions. Let it be stopped. I will fight to put an end to such business.

3rd. I believe in the conservation of the public lands, forests and mines and shall do my utmost to have legislation looking to these subjects enacted. Those who have acquired any of these rights belonging to the government without just compensation shall be made to return them.

4th. I am for an act of Congress providing for a ship subsidy. All the great ocean liners are run between this country and Europe by foreigners. Millions of dollars revenue go into the treasuries of foreign nations, most of which come from the pockets of Americans, this nation getting nothing.

ALEXANDER RANDALL HAGNER.

CROTHERS AT SMALL BUSINESS.

The removal of Mr. Wm. L. Amoss, director of Farmers Institutes since the organization of that department some 13 years ago, to make room for a political servant of Governor Crothers is an object lesson to the people of this county, where Mr. Amoss and his life long interest in the welfare of the agriculturists are so well known, which serves to emphasize the small politics being played by the Governor in his efforts to build up a Crothers machine. When it comes to talk and to loud profession of devotion to the welfare of the farmers, Crothers can make more noise than a regiment, but when the performing comes we see exhibitions like the removal of Mr. Amoss.—Bel Air Times.

THE PRIMARY SYSTEM AN EFFECTUAL AGENCY FOR REFORM.

In an interview published in the Sun Monday Mr. George Stewart Brown gave practical and suggestive views concerning the influence of the Democratic organization and money at primary elections in Baltimore. "Money and the machine can only dominate," said Mr. Brown, "when the people are asleep. * * * If we stay at home from the primary, it does not lie in our mouths to complain of money influence in our political life."

This is the obvious truth. The primary system cannot automatically work reforms. It is simply an instrument whose value and efficiency depend upon the people themselves. It affords the people the opportunity to name good men for public office. If the people desire to send the best-equipped men to Congress, or to the Legislature, they can make their power felt decisively at the primary in the nomination of candidates. It rests with them whether they shall have government administered by men of high character and ability, or whether they shall permit party organizations to make nominations for public office.

Wherever the primary system exists the people have an effective weapon for correcting the abuses of machine government and for restricting the power of political bosses. If they do not use the weapon discriminatingly and courageously, they are responsible for the failure of the primary system to curb the power of the political machines. "The machine can only dominate," as Mr. Brown aptly says, "when the people are asleep." If the Democratic voters of Baltimore do not make their influence felt at the primary in the nomination of candidates for Congress and other public offices, the responsibility of unacceptable nominations must be shouldered by them. If they shirk a duty which ought to be performed by every man who has the good of the city and of his party at heart, they deliberately throw away the opportunity to put the best men available in public office. The blame rests upon them and not upon the primary system, which responds to the will of the majority of the people when the people make general and intelligent use of it.—Baltimore Sun.

ASHER GLADE.

I know the night is near at hand,
The mists lie low on hill and bay,
The summer sheaves are dewless dry;
But we have had the day.

We have had a very hot week and plenty of sickness.

Mrs. Della E. Fike, who has been suffering from an attack of typhoid fever, is somewhat better.

Mrs. Bertha Thomas and little daughter, Pansy, have both been sick during the past week.

Making hay is the order of the day and there is quite a lot of it being put away this week.

Mr. John S. Fike is sick. Dr. Meyers, of Markleysburg, Pa., is attending him.

Mr. Sylvester Glover, who moved to this section last spring, has moved to Markleysburg, Pa.

Mr. Walter S. Fearer, while logging for Mr. Everett Dunham, was caught by a log which crushed the bone in one leg so badly that it is feared he will be crippled for life.

Mr. Wm. Fearer and wife were out during the past week to visit their daughter, Della, who is sick.

Mr. Geo. F. Wass, of Addison, Pa., was in this section selling fertilizer for wheat and spent the night at Wm. H. Thomas'.

Stork Visits.

The stork visited a number of homes in Oakland recently, the latest visit being to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Weimer yesterday afternoon when it left a little daughter.

On Saturday morning the home of the editor of THE REPUBLICAN was made happy by a visit from this most welcome bird—the first time in more than eight years—when a little daughter was left in our keeping.

BOLDEN, BROWN & WEIMER'S AUSPICIOUS OPENING.

New Firm Begins Business Under Very Favorable Circumstances.

The invitation extended through the columns of this paper last Thursday by Messrs. Bolden, Brown & Weimer, Oakland's new mercantile firm, to the public to visit their store on the opening night, was very generously responded to by the people on Friday evening, the large building on Second street being crowded and packed to its utmost capacity.

The visitors were made welcome by members of the firm and those in their employ who took pleasure in conducting them through the several departments and exhibiting the great variety of seasonable and well selected goods.

Refreshments consisting of ice cream, lemonade, etc., were served with a lavish hand by the firm and the Mountain City Band furnished excellent music throughout the evening.

The store is a well lighted, well ventilated and exceedingly pretty room, the fixtures and other paraphernalia being of the best and selected with an eye to the comfort of the customers and the despatch of business.

The firm will make a specialty of all lines of goods with which the store is already filled.

A full line of Gas Ranges, Heaters, Hot Plates, Inverted and Upright Lights. Call and see us. S. Lawtont & Sons.

On last Saturday Lieut. E. S. West sold at private sale to ex-County Commissioner A. Clyde Smith the Weimer farm near Thayerville. This is the same property advertised in these columns last week to be sold at public auction on Saturday.

The Children's Day exercises at St. Mark's church last Sunday morning were attended by a large crowd of people and those taking part in the service performed very creditably. They were drilled by Miss Manges and other ladies for their parts.

Mr. C. D. Hershberger, of Grantsville, brought a party of Elk Lick (Pa.) gentlemen to Oakland Sunday afternoon returning Monday in Mr. Hershberger's automobile. Those in the party were Messrs. Noah and Clyde Newman, William Lichliter and Jeff Smearman.

The ladies of the Epworth League of St. Paul's M. E. church will conduct an exchange this afternoon and hold a lawn fete tonight on the lawn at the church. The Mountain City Band will be in attendance and furnish music at night. All are most cordially invited.

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Ellithorp and daughter, Miss Amanda, accompanied by their guest, Miss Broadwater, of Minnesota, came up to Oakland from Bittinger yesterday morning and will return this afternoon. They made the trip here in Mr. C. D. Hershberger's automobile.

Master Hadley Heindel, Carlisle street, met with a painful accident on Monday. Having several cartridges which had been given him by soldiers during the encampment, he set one on fire. It exploded, seriously burning his hands and limbs.—Gettysburg Corr. Emmittsburg Chronicle.

Children's Day was celebrated in Bond Methodist church last Sunday and thanks to the efforts of Mrs. and Miss Brumbaugh and the deep interest of the children a very excellent program was rendered. The church was far too small to accommodate the people from far and near, and everything passed off very nicely.

Capt. and Mrs. R. R. Sanner, of Uniontown, Pa., are here on a visit to their son, Mr. N. R. Sanner. Capt. Sanner was engaged in educational work in Oakland a number of years ago and is highly regarded by many of his former pupils and all his old-time acquaintances. Apparently he is as young as he was a quarter of a century ago.

LOST—On the road between Abel DeWitt's and Henry Casteel's on Saturday, June 25th, a horse contract book Finder please leave at First National Bank and receive reward. D. J. Swartzentruber.

Complaints by the traveling public are being made on account of the fact that Hooppole road north of Thayerville has been closed by the contractors, who are engaged reconstructing it. Locked gates have been thrown across the road at two points between Rodeheaver's and Thayerville and traffic along the only road leading from Oakland and Deer Park to the northern end of the county has been effectually blocked and as a result many people who have business here and at nearby points are inconvenienced and without just reason. The road should be kept open at all hazards.

The new one hundred and twentyfive horse power gas engine purchased several weeks ago by Mr. D. E. Offutt for the Oakland Electric Company, has been received and is now in place in the company's building adjoining the railroad yards. The machine will be tested within the next week, a delay having been occasioned on account of some portions of the engine not having been shipped from the factory until a day or two ago. The engine is a massive piece of iron and steel and will be driven by gas furnished by the Northern Natural Gas Company. The approximate weight of the engine and fly wheels, which are above seven feet in diameter, is more than twenty tons.

SAYS TAGS ARE UGLY

Automobilists Object to the New License Number.

With the arrival of the new license tags for automobiles there has arisen unanimous and violent protest from the drivers of these machines. They say the new tags are uncompromisingly ugly and cheap-looking, and the drivers look rueful when they think of disfiguring their spic-and span new toys with these "push-cart licenses," as they call call them.

"Wonder is the man who ordered this thing ever saw an auto?" queried one of the veterans as he gazed disgustedly at the yellow and black strip of tin.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARY NYDEGGER.

Mrs. Mary Nydegger, aged 76 years, died at her home on Randolph avenue, Elkins, W. Va., Monday evening, August 8. Mrs. Nydegger had been ill for several months and her death was not unexpected. The deceased is survived by three sons: Dr. J. A. Nydegger, of Pittsburg, and John F. and W. D., of Elkins. The body was interred at Gorman yesterday.

Railroad Workman Hurt.

A Slav, engaged on construction work west of Oakland, was struck by the through westbound express train Sunday morning at a point near Hutton. He was brought to Oakland on the accommodation a short time afterward and taken to the office of Dr. Legge where an examination revealed the fact that he was painfully injured about the head. Later in the day the injured man was taken to Cumberland and placed in one of the hospitals there for treatment.

A father—not a millionaire—left at his death a number of children and a certain sum to be divided among them as follows: The eldest to receive $100 and one-tenth of the remainder; the second child $200 and one-tenth of what then remained, and so on, each child to receive $100 more than the one immediately preceeding, and then one-tenth part of which still remained. When the division took place, it was found that all the children received the same amount. How many children were there, and what sum did each receive?

A Colonist of Canaan

By Izola Forrester

The Southwestern flier drew up at Canaan Junction. It never stopped, merely slowed up long enough to throw out the mail sack, and give the curly-headed boy in the express car a chance to call hello to Nell.

But today it stopped, stopped while one man swung off a sleeper, and the porter dropped a suit case and grip on the platform beside him.

The man left behind was young, so young that he had outgrown his years, and there was a latent, careless strength, mixed with awkwardness about him that reminded one of a cub.

Nell took one look at him and caught her breath sharply. She knew him in an instant, but there was a bare chance that he had forgotten her. It had been four years, and four years is a lengthy stretch when one is 17.

He set the suit case down under the ticket shelf, and went back to the water bucket.

"It's hot enough down here, isn't it?" She watched him drain the tin cup a second time before she answered: "We don't mind it much."

"I suppose not. I came from the north. Don't suppose you know anybody here named Acton?"

The girl's hand closed tightly over the package of letters she had drawn from the mail sack. Her back was toward him. But her voice was steady and natural.

"No, I don't."

"You'd be pretty likely to know, handling all the mail, and so on, wouldn't you?"

"Oh, yes, I would know. I know the name of everybody in this town!"

"Except mine."

He came over to the ledge and leaned one elbow on it, smiling in at her cheerfully. She did not answer.

"Maybe he's using a different name," he went on, presently. "He had plenty of cause to change it, the Lord knows, when he started down this way. I know he's here all right, and I'm going to find him."

She Knew Him in an Instant.

The telegraph instrument set up its call, and she sat down to answer it. When she rose her face was flushed slightly, and anybody well acquainted with Nell would have surmised that she was on the war path. Jopman, the town nearest the state line, was asking about Colonel Acton. Canaan Junction again stated that the party was unknown there.

"Is there a chief of police here in town?"

"Chief of police!" She flashed a startled glance at him. "No. There's a constable. He's the undertaker, too."

"Nice, handy combination," he laughed. "You people down here in this small, new town certainly economize on public offices. Thanks, I'll hunt him up. Goodby."

"Goodby." She watched him as he went along the road towards the main street, his long, easy strides kicking up a flurry of dust behind him.

The whistle over at the factory was blowing for noon. She caught up the telephone receiver and called a number.

"I want to speak to father, please. Is he there? Well, wait. Give him a message. Tell him to come over to the depot right away. Tell him to come around by the river road, not Main street. I want to show him something there."

Then she waited. It seemed hours before she caught sigat of the dear old figure, swinging along the river road, his gray felt hat well back on his head, his gray mustache and imperial giving added distinction to the fine, gracious face. The tears rushed to her eyes as she watched him, but she controlled herself, and met him with a smile.

"Sit down and rest a minute, honey. You've got 20 minutes. They—they've wired for you to come down to Alcazar. It's some committee meeting, I believe." She turned away, and bent over a time table, so that he should not see her tell-tale eyes. "You can make the 1:10 local, dear. And—don't bother about coming back tonight. I'm sure they need you down there."

"In a rush, aren't they?" laughed the colonel, wiping off his forehead. 'Guess it's about their new town hall. It consists of four flags on a center plot at present, with a geranium bed in the middle. I suppose I'll have to go. Be all right, won't you, Nell?"

She nodded and smiled. It was 15 minutes now. She watched the road to Main street every now and then, half expecting Fate to play her a trick and send the long-limbed stranger back again. It wasn't wrong. She told herself over and over again, it wasn't.

A hundred suggestions and plans swept through her mind as she listened to him chat of the new town hall at Alcazar. Then all at once there was a dead silence, and she turned quickly. The colonel stood in the center of the little depot, his hands clasped comfortably under his coat tails, his lips pursed up for a whistle. And he was looking at the suitcase under the window ledge, a suitcase with the owner's name written boldly across it, "J. P. Dexter."

Nell leaned her hands on the desk and waited tensely. She had forgotten to hide the suitcase.

"Well, honey girl, the cat wouldn't stay put, would it? And you going to all this trouble just to try and save your dad from himself." The colonel spoke very calmly, very reflectively, almost with a glint of humor in his blue eyes, as he saw the look on Nell's face. "When did Jack Dexter get here?"

"Father, listen." She put both hands up on his shoulders and leaned her face against his chin. She was just about on a level with his chin. "You must take this train. Surely, when you know you're in the right, it doesn't matter what other people think. They don't know for sure that you are here yet. The night operator said you were, but I know he isn't certain. I can turn Jack Dexter away. He didn't know me at all. Think of them sending him down here to bring you back, the boy that owed everything to you."

"He had to do his duty if they sent him. I certainly wish it had been some one else. I always set a heap by Jack. He's a right fine boy. Studied law with the judge after we left, Nell. I understand he's prosecuting attorney.'

From the bridge came the whistle of the 1:10. She was on time to the minute. The ticker was calling the Canaan operator, and she went to it, the tears streaming from her eyes. As the local pulled in the colonel stood in the doorway and swept his broad-brimmed felt hat off in a general salute.

And the 1:10 pulled out without its extra passenger.

Somebody came hurrying along the platform and into the depot.

"I can't locate him yet, but I'm going to stay over—" Jack Dexter stopped short and whistled softly under his breath. The colonel held Nell close to him, and smiled.

"How are you, boy, how are you?" he said, heartily. "I can't offer you my hand, because, you see, they're both engaged. I'm mighty glad to see you again, Jack. Just take your suitcase right over to my house, sir, and we'll have a good dinner before we start north tonight. "He put up one hand as Jack started to explain, and shook his head warningly. "No need for explanations. I understand the situation thoroughly. I don't want to disturb Nellie here, with any of the details."

"But, Colonel Acton," Jack exclaimed. "You don't know what I'm after, sir. I came down to let you know that that indictment is squashed flatter than a pancake. The whole city is waiting to welcome you back, if you'll only come. The president of the bank confessed to the full amount, swore he had made a scapegoat of you, sir, and then gracefully committed suicide. It was the wisest thing he'd done in five years."

"Well, now, that's too bad," the colonel said, regretfully. "He need not have done that. I was comfortable down here. It's home to Nell and myself. In fact, we feel rather responsible for the future of Canaan. Mighty fine of you to come down and let me know, Jack, though; mighty fine."

"I wanted to be the first to tell you, sir." Dexter's hand gripped the colonel's closely. "A crowd of the newspaper boys were after your trail, but I knew you'd be in the same place where you left word we could find you if you were wanted."

The colonel smiled in a pleased, comfortable fashion all his own.

"We keep our word we Actons," he said. "Don't we, Nell?"

"I can hardly say that," she faltered. "I—I didn't tell the truth to Mr. Dexter when he asked me if I knew you. I just couldn't. I don't know what he must think of me."

"Think of you?" gasped Dexter. "I think you are the bravest, truest, bulliest—"

The colonel coughed and glanced at his watch.

"We will all lunch in honor of the occasion over at the hotel, sir. Jack, just give my little girl your arm along Main street. I'll lock up the station and carry the suitcase until the next train comes along. No, sir, I can't permit it, as my guest, you will allow me to have my way." Jack hesitated still, looking down at the heavy suitcase, and the colonel gave him a delicate poke in the side. "Ladies first, sir, right about face—forward, march!"

For Hot Days

JUST the newest and loveliest things in millinery for the all too brief midsummer have been placed before the fascinated eyes of the devotee to outdoors and fashion. Black and white or the coldest of colors, lace and more lace, these are the paramount ideas that the modistes have put into triumphs of execution. Nothing was ever imagined for the dog days, lovelier than the hat of white chip in which the contour of the brim is outlined with two rolled folds of black velvet placed on the under side. About the crown are set large roses made of fine princess lace and set in dark green foliage. These flowers of lace are exquisite. So far the lily and rose have been made and no other blossoms can be more beautiful than they. Wide Val edging for the roses and all-over patterns for the lillies are destined to be the favorite, but if one possesses a long purse or has some yards of old lace, please imagine roses made of a duchess lace! The finest of silk covered wire has to be sewed in to hold the petals or simulated petals in place. For the roses, a wreath can be managed without cutting the lace but for lilies the petals must be shaped; unless each is made separately by a lacemaker. No one will be so foolish as to cut up fine hand made laces. Lillies, therefore, are destined to be made of the best machine made laces. But, as this season will not see the last of the lace flowers, it is worth while to make separate petals of rennaisance of other fine lace, for those who know how.

Numbers of hats in hair braid or hemp or fine chip are overlaid with wide chantilly lace. Black over white chip or white over black, is all there is to tell. Plumes, pompons and aigrettes finish them; these, too, in black or white.

The small drooping brim round hat continues the favorite for motoring and general wear when the matter of protection claims the first attention. Black and white striped ribbon and button roses, made of straw like that in the hat, leave nothing to be desired for such a model. In the picture the hat is of silver-blue straw, the flowers of the same, and a long adjustible veil of white chiffon is an accessory to be put on and off at pleasure.

LINEN DRESS

A simple semi-princess dress is shown here, that is a style specially suited to linen. The panel front that extends the whole length is attached to the sides by wide wrapped seams. The back is not a panel, but the bodice and skirt have slight fulness at waist. The turn-over collar and cuffs are of embroidered lawn.

Materials required: 6 yards 40 inches wide.

Bracelets Over Gloves.

Few women seem to realize that bracelets over gloves are almost or quite as bad as rings over gloves. If one wears a bracelet with long gloves at all it should be worn under them; but if possible it should not be worn.

GLOVES MATCH THE COSTUME.

No More White Ones Are Worn, and Where They Seem Necessary Cream Color Is Used.

No more white gloves! Gloves match the costume, or where they ought to be white, according to all social canons, they are cream. Suede slippers, too, match the costume, and the stockings with them are—flesh colored!

Vanity bags of gold clasp now like a flat purse. The meshed bags are no longer plain, but are in two metals—gold and gunmetal, or exidized silver and copper—interwoven in a quaint pattern.

Tortoise-shell is made up into everything, from powder cases to umbrella handles; and there is a great deal of gunmetal and jet seen, owing to the king's death and the public mourning that Paris seems to have assumed with England.

For the same reason, orchids, real and artificial, are on view everywhere, since they were Edward's favorite flower.

Finally, wooden beads. The fad has become a craze, and wooden beads, in black and colors, are as thick as locusts during the plague in Egypt.

Silk Fishnet.

If in your shopping tours you are fortunate enough to see a piece of silk fishnet, buy it.

The coars mesh offers little covering, but much decoration, when used over a contrasting shade of supple material.

In gray or the favorite twine color it allows almost any combination. For entire turbans, for huge bows or for transparent scarfs to be thrown over gorgeous evening costumes, fishnet is a valuable asset in the up-to-date woman's wardrobe.

A Cushion Edge.

Scallops—large shallow scallops done in coarse buttonhole stitch with linen floss or heavy cotton—form the attractive edge of a cretonne sofa pillow.

It is advisable to use the natural linen color of the background, as it will be found more effective than the more brilliant colors of the flowers.

The KITCHEN CABINET

"THERE are so many things—best things—that commonly come when youth is past, that it may well happen to many of us to find ourselves happier and happier at the last."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

When the rubber plant droops, its leaves turn yellow and drop off. Mix a teaspoonful of mustard in a cupful of boiling water, cool a little and pour on the soil in the pot; sometimes a long, black hard-shelled worm comes to the top, and if this is killed the plant will usually recover.

Another treatment good for other plants troubled with worms, is to bury a small piece of fresh beef in the pot near the surface, and the worms will come up to eat it, when they can be killed.

Out-door roses may be slipped as any plant with good success if care is taken to keep them moist.

Try using borax dissolved in hot water to remove the spots made by grease of any kind on woolen fabrics. Fold a clean cloth for a pad to use under the spot and then simply put the spot with a cloth wet in the borax water until the spot is removed.

One may have fresh corn on the cob in these days the year around. Take off the coarse outer husks, remove all the silk and tie a cord tightly around the end to hold the inner husks in place. Put into a brine strong enough to hold up an egg, put under a weight, and you will have corn on the ear any time, by soaking it over night.

Mint Sauce.

Mint sauce is such an addition to the lamb roast or chops that it should always be served. Prepare it by mincing the mint very fine with a sharp knife. To two tablespoonfuls of minced mint add a tablespoonful of powdered sugar, a tablespoonful each of boiling water and vinegar. Let stand a few minutes to season before serving.

Cream Sauce.

Melt a tablespoonful and a half of butter, add the same amount of flour, cook until thick, then add a cupful of hot milk. Season and simmer for ten minutes. Add half a cupful of green peas previously cooked, and serve hot.

WE MEASURE success by accumulation. The measure is false. The true measure is appreciation. He who loves most has most.—Henry Van Dyke.

SUMMER BREAKFASTS.

The summer breakfast is even more of a problem than that of any other season. The appetite is so fickle that dishes that appeal to the eye are especially sought after. On a hot morning serve the cereal cooked the day before and placed on ice. Served with cream and fresh fruit it is most wholesome.

When one feels the need of a heartier dish at breakfast, croquettes of various kinds are both filling and appetizing. The rice left from the pudding of the day before may be used. Add to a pint of boiled rice two well beaten eggs, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, salt and paprika to taste with a few drops of onion juice. Set aside until cold, then make into croquettes, dip in egg and crumbs and fry in deep fat.

Baked eggs in cream make a pleasant change in serving eggs.

Whole wheat bread made with nuts is a highly nutritious bread and served with fruit makes a good, well-balanced meal.

A slice of well prepared toast with fresh butter and berries served with a cup of fragrant coffee, rich with cream, is sufficiently satisfying to most appetites these hot mornings.

Back to the Home.

We are hearing so much these days about getting back to the farm. We need more tillers of the soil, it is true; but we also need a more earnest desire for home building in our cities and towns. There are so many opportunities for starting a home on small savings that a home of one's own should be the first consideration.

The thousands of people with little children who are living in the close quarters of an apartment house or tenement, who might be in cozy homes of their own, need to be shown what they are losing in a thousand ways. What an incentive it is to be saving, to have an object such as a home to work for. The hand-to-mouth liver in the apartment house knows nothing of this joy.

Cafe Parfait.

Set a bowl in a pan of cracked ice, and turn into it one quart of thick cream. Add to this one-half cupful of very strong filtered coffee and one-half cupful of powdered sugar. Mix lightly with cream, whip with an egg beater, skimming off the top and draining in a sieve. Continue to beat until no more froth will arise. Turn into a mold rinsed with cold water and pack in ice and salt for four hours before serving.

WANTS HER LETTER PUBLISHED

For Benefit of Women who Suffer from Female Ills

Minneapolis, Minn.—"I was a great sufferer from female troubles which caused a weakness and broken down condition of the system. I read so much of what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had done for other suffering women I felt sure it would help me, and I must say it did help me wonderfully. My pains all left me, I grew stronger, and within three months I was a perfectly well woman.

"I want this letter made public to show the benefit women may derive from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. JOHN G. MOLDAN, 2115 Second St., North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Thousands of unsolicited and genuine testimonials like the above prove the efficiency of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which is made exclusively from roots and herbs.

Women who suffer from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of these facts or doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

If you want special advice write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. She will treat your letter as strictly confidential. For 20 years she has been helping sick women in this way, free of charge. Don't hesitate—write at once.

Among the Many Mansions

By Rev. James Mudge, D. D.
Montreal, Can.

"In my Father's house are many mansions."—John 14:2.

Too much can hardly be made of the fact that heaven, in a very important sense, is here and now. Nevertheless, there is, of course, a life hereafter beyond this world, a life eternal in Immanuel's land. There is a place "where Christ is," a place which He told His disciples He would prepare for their final abode. What should be our attitude toward it, our feeling about it? What use can we profitably make of it in the deepening of our spirituality, the perfecting of our character?

It is a test both of our faith and our faithfulness. In proportion to the vigor of our faith will be the clearness of our sight of the things unseen by mortal eye, our realization of the intangible. We may have a faith so strong that there will be no more doubt as to the reality of that world than of this, no hesitation whatever in accepting the intimations concerning it which are found in the written Word, no question as to the satisfying solidity of its joys, the permanency of the rich possessions to which it introduces the redeemed. What will give us this faith? Our faithfulness to God and duty, our living constantly in His presence, our cultivating those faculties which apprehend the things of the spirit. "The doctrine of immortality,' it has been well said, "is an achievement and can be present in power only as the issue of that spiritual growth whose flower and fruit it is to be." If we would achieve certainty about it we must so live that it alone stands as the interpretation and consummation of our days. We must habitually cherish such convictions in our soul, must breathe such a high spiritual atmosphere, must walk so closely with the infinite one, with the Heavenly Father, in our daily experience that no other outcome of our being than its blissful continuance beyond death will seem in any way reasonable or possible. Such is the only path to perfect peace in this matter. How can a man of evil life really believe in the hereafter? How can he who is living wholly, or mainly, or even largely for this passing world obtain or retain a firm hold on the fact that there is another world far more important a palace to which this is but a portico? He could not live as he does if he did so believe. His choosing that kind of life inevitably deadens or destroys his power of belief in anything better by and by. We know as to the future what we are capable of knowing. If we would know more we must be more. If we would see further into the future we must live at a higher elevation. This, and not seances or table movings or supposed materializations of the spirits of the departed, is the way to get solid ground under one's feet as to the other world.

Should longings for Heaven fill much of our thought and time? Not to such an extent as to prevent the devotion of all our energies to the work assigned us by the Master. Surely not to the breeding of the slightest discontent with the duration of our tarrying here. St. Paul's position about it (Phil. 1:23) would seem to be ideal. He keenly appreciated the glorious gain involved in the transition to the splendor as yet so imperfectly revealed, but he also appreciated fully the joy of laboring for Jesus on this earth and increasing the triumphs of the gospel. He was sufficiently unselfish to put aside his own joy in favor of the advantage of his converts and others to whom he could do still further good. It is certainly safe to leave the decision as to the best time and manner of our death with God, assured that it shall be exactly aright and need not concern us in the least. It is not natural or possible for those in perfect health, in the springtime of youth, with the inviting, untried experience of life in this world all before them, to feel about another world as they reasonably may who are manifestly near it and whose friends are mostly there. Yet at all ages it is wholesome to keep in the background of our thought the solemn fact that we are pilgrims and strangers on these shores of time, and soon to launch forth for a voyage to fairer climes.

The gospel view of death, that it is gain, not loss, to the believer; sunrise, not sunset; transition, not destruction; birth into a higher state of being; something to be hailed with joy, not shrunk from with horror, is far too rare. Most people, as the apostle says, are "all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death" (Heb. 11:15), not knowing that Christ hath abolished death and brought life and immortality" (II Tim. 1:10). What a pity that they should thus miss, through lack of faith, one of their chief joys, the deliverance assured to them in Jesus. It is our privilege, as Browning says, to "greet the unseen with a cheer," to feel that it well accords with "the noon day, the bustle of man's work time," to think of and prepare for and pass to the higher world which waits us there. What, indeed, is there to fear in death, the foe that the mighty Prince of Life so effectually conquered, binding him to His triumphant chariot wheels?

It's mighty hard being patient with the man who prates of his patience.

ECONOMIC LOSS FROM DRINK

United States Has Passed Million Dollar Mark in Describing Damage, Now Billionaire.

Of our more than eighty-three millions of people about twenty-five millions are wage-earners, and ont less than two millions are "captains of industry" and their salaried lieutenants. The average wage is about $1.56 (6s.) per day, but the product is worth at least $2 to the employer, who must have a profit, and at least as much to the nation, said Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Ph. D., in a speech to the Twelfth International Congress on Alcoholism, held in London. One-tenth of that for 300 days means $60 per year for each workman, and a total for all wage-earners of $1,150,000,000 (£230,000,000). In the United States, we have passed the period of millions in describing the damage from drink, for alcohol has become a "billionaire."

We are not dependent on laboratory experiments for proof that even a moderate use of alcohol impairs efficiency. Benjamin Franklin, in the eighteenth century, observed as a printer, what Dr. Aschaffenburg has just proved by tests, that sober printers do more and better work than drinkers. That is why 51 per cent. of a representative list of American employers, questioned by the United States Bureau of Labor some years since, reported that they discriminated in all or a part of their work in favor of abstainers as employees. The athletic records and the tests of soldiers in marksmanship and marching all tell the same story, that even moderate use of intoxicants decreases efficiency. When we turn to the "captains of industry" and their lieutenants, from whose ranks life insurance has obtained most of the test cases that have shown that total abstainers, other conditions being equal, live fully 15 per cent. longer than even those very moderate drinkers who are allowed to insure, we see that the losses in valuable lives must rise to millions more. The loosening of the tongue and drugging of judgment and conscience, and the shortening of a life worth $10,000 a year becomes a very costly matter when the man is the manager of a great business or the leader of an army, or the arbiter of a nation's politics. In this age of keen competition, national as well as individual, it is the "fit" that "survive" and succeed. Many Japanese gave up sake during the war with Russia that they might contribute the money thus saved as a patriotic offering to the nation's war fund. In Britain, Germany, and other lands, patriots might well abstain for a patriotic re-enforcement to the nation's efficiency, by which the supreme industrial "battle of the nations" shall be ultimately decided.

DRINK OUTLAY IS LESSENED

Liquor Provisions of British Budget Bring in Less Revenue, but More Sobriety.

George B. Wilson, secretary of the United Kingdom alliance, states that the drink bill of England for 1909 shows a decrease over 1908 of £5,897,997 ($29,475,000). On spirits the decrease was £4,800,000 ($24,000,000), with a decrease in consumption of 7,022,775 gallons. On beer the decrease was £1,186,000 ($5,940,000), with a decrease in consumption of 645,396 barrels. On wine there was an increase of £93,000 ($465,000), with an increase in consumption of 103,744 gallons. Mr. Wilson believes that the increase in the price of spirits and beer due to the budget was largely responsible for the decreased consumption. He declares that if there had been no increase in prices the reduction of the total expenditure for 1909 would have been £11,147,997 ($55,739,900).

Mr. Wilson estimates that the liquor drinking class is about 55 per cent. of the total population. According to these figures the per capita expenditure is approximately $30.50 per year. Two-thirds of the total drink bill, or nearly £2,000,000 ($10,000,000) a week, is said to be spent by the working classes. "If they are above the poverty line," says Mr. Wilson, "this wasted expenditure tends to bring them under it; if they are under it, the waste aggravates their difficulties. Drink-caused poverty is the worst kind of poverty, because it does not make the best of the available resources and is invariably associated with moral and physical degradation. The burden of the drink evil falls heavily on the woman; it crushes the child.'

Mr. Wilson believes in the efficacy of repressive legislation to diminish the drink evil. However, he admits that the diminished consumption of acoholic liquors is to some extent the result of a continuous change in the habits of the people—"a change," he remarks, "that seems likely to be permanent."

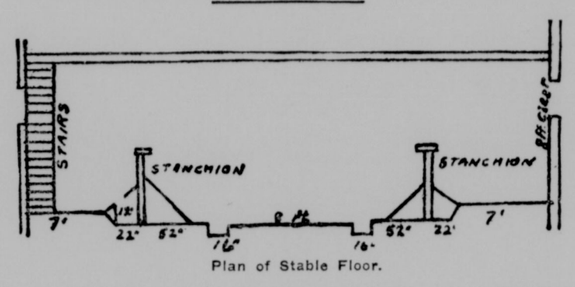
IMPORTANT ESSENTIALS IN COMFORTABLE CATTLE BARN

Light, Ventilation, Warmth and Convenience Are Among Factors That Go to Make Stable Paying Investment.



Plan of Stable Floor.

As the putting in of the crops is completed farmers will be repairing and remodeling and otherwise improving their cattle barns, many will be building new ones. The average cattle barn is not usually laid out for comfort, and without comfort the dairy cow will be far from doing her best. Convenience is also a most important factor in those times of high-priced farm hands.

Light ventilation and warmth—also convenience—are the essentials in a cattle barn. Windows of ample size must extend on every side and end. The barn should be at least 36 feet wide, and length to accommodate what stock is expected to be kept.

So-called mangers are to be avoided. The cows face the sides of the barn, and for purposes of ventilation and general sanitation, this is the only way a stock barn should be made.

The general construction of the floor plan is well shown in the illustration with deails of measurements. The driveway is 8 feet wide between the cows. This is two inches below the general level of the stalls. A gutter, six inches below the driveway and 8 inches below the stalls, is 16 inches wide. This must be watertight to retain the liquids. The stalls vary from 48 inches to 54 inches from the edge of the drop to the stanchions to fit cows of different length. A space of 22 inches is left for a feeding place. A slope rise of 12 inches forms all the manger needed, a space of 5 to 7 feet is left in the front for feeding. The slope partitions should come to within 14 inches of the gutter. The partitions in front should be between every other cow. This allows a water supply for every two cows to drink from. The platform should have a slope of ⅜ inches to the foot to drain the liquid to the gutter.

The best stanchion is the swing-stanchion fastened at the top and bottom with a chain that allows about two inches of play back and front. For ventilation a space is left in front of the cattle, under the breast-girth (3 feet high), and partitioned off three feet high and three feet wide, so that cold fresh air can pass to the stable from the floor above to second story. These boxes may be 15 to 20 feet apart. Over these openings slide doors control the inrush of the cold air. The air escapes through the roof. These openings serve for throwing hay down to the feeding alley before pitching to the cows.

SECURE STAND OF POTATOES

Potato Grower Should Take Stock of His Success in Work to This Point in Season—Moisture Is First.

(By C. L. FITCH, Colorado Agricultural College.)

This is the time for the potato grower to observe what sort of a stand he has secured, to take stock, as it were, of his success in his work to this point in the season.

In the first place, moisture is necessary. A potato may sprout, but will not root unless it touches damp soil, and if the season and atmosphere be very dry, growth will be backward, even with moisture beneath. The potato ground should have been filled with moisture before plowing, and the moisture held there by stirring the surface shallow, as with a harrow. If, however, the moisture be not there, the potatoes must be cultivated, ditched and irrigated, and then harrowed lengthwise, as soon as horses can be used.

A heavy rain following planting is a great damage, because it sets the soil of the tuber bed and will damage the shape of the crop. Prolonged rains will rot the seed. The best stands are secured on fields that were plowed in good condition, lightly harrowed, quickly planted, and that then happened to secure one long, gentle shower, followed by warm weather.

Examine the hills that come up last, after the run of the thrifty plants. You will find three causes for these tardy arrivals: Some were in a pocket of dry earth of a field not properly and promptly leveled and harrowed; others will be found growing from very small seed pieces—pieces perhaps broken from the others by the planter; but the most of the runty plants will be found coming from rotten or rotting seed pieces. Thus, moisture, good-sized seed, and sound seed are necessary to a vigorous stand. The best crops are secured in years when the seed stays sound until digging.

And back of all is the planter, and the right size of even cut seed for it to handle. Seventy-five per cent. is a fair stand; 95 per cent. is far more profitable. Your planter should not miss more than three or four per cent.

Record Onion Crop.

It is claimed that Charles Volz of the Mission community, Mission, Tex., holds the world's record for profits from intensive farming. He recently sold his Bermuda onion crop on 24 acres for $12,982. Deducting the expenses of planting, cultivating, harvesting and marketing, the crop left him a net return of $9,083. The onion yield from these 24 acres filled 22 cars. The product was shipped to northern and eastern markets. The land could have been bought ten years ago for one dollar an acre.

The First Creamery.

So far as known, the first creamery built in the United States was at Middletown, N. Y., in 1863, the second at Binghampton, that state. The creamery business was for a good many years confined to that part of the country. Not until about 25 years ago were any built out through the west.

SHROPSHIRE EWE OF QUALITY

The Shropshire ewe, shown in the illustration, owned by George McKerrow & Sons of Wisconsin, is remarkable for quality. She is well developed, with a broad back, short legs and compact fleece.

Clever Joke of Kind King.

King Edward's great nature was illustrated the other night by a London correspondent at the Press club in New York.

"The king," said the correspondent, "was visiting Rufford Abbey, and one morning, in company with his host, Lord Arthur Savile, he took a walk over the preserves.

"Suddenly Lord Arthur, a big burly man, rushed forward and seized a shabby fellow with a dead pheasant protruding from the breast of his coat.

"'Sir,' said Lord Arthur to the king, 'this fellow is a bad egg. This is the second time I've caught him poaching.'

"But the king's handsome face beamed, and he laughed his gay and tolerant laugh.

"'Oh, let him go,' he said. 'If he really were a bad egg, you know, he wouldn't poach.'"

The Good Old Times.

There is a lot of talk about the "good old times." There weren't any "good old times," if you are talking about wash day or house cleaning. Those tasks meant red hands and headaches and backaches and trouble. Easy Task laundry soap would have made them "good" old times indeed. It does half the work in washing and cleaning; it drives the dirt out and not in; it doesn't shrink flannels or streak linens, and it hasn't any rosin in it to rot the fabrics. If your grocer isn't living in the good old times he sells it—lots of it!

Qualified.

A prominent western attorney tells of a boy who once applied at his office for work.

"This boy was bright looking and I rather took to him.

"'Now, my son,' I said, 'if you come to work for me you will occasionally have to write telegrams and take down telephone messages. Hence a pretty high degree of schooling is essential. Are you fairly well educated?'

"The boy smiled confidently.

"'I be,' he said."—Independent.

Rev. James E Connell Replies to Rev. G. R. Willirmson.

To the Editor of The Republican:

In the interests of truth and justice and fair play, will you kindly allow me a little space to answer the letter of the Rev. G. R. Williamson concerning the attitude of Catholics towards the public schools. I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible.

As regards the reverend gentleman's disquisition on the rights of the preachers to cry out against the abettors of fraud and injustice, we are glad to be able to say we are in hearty accord with him. The fact is there was no need of spending so much time and energy in trying to prove a point which all right-thinking people will readily concede. But anent the application of his principle to a certain particular, concrete fact, that is a horse of quite a different color. As the old Latins would put it: "Toto coelo distat."

Passing over his column and a half of irrelevant matter, we come to the onus of his letter. Briefly his thesis is this: That Catholics are unfitted to take part in the management of the public schools. In his own words: "The Catholic who * * * holds a position as officer or teacher in the public school, will be from the very nature of the case either false to his church and true to the school, or false to the school and true to the church." He tries to prove his thesis by pointing out that the "politico(!!!)-ecclesiastical body known as the Roman Catholic church has through all our history been the implacable foe of the public school; has sought by intringue, intimidation, etc., to have a division of the school funds; and has persistently opposed the reading of the Word of God in our public schools."

As to his first supposed proof, we deny it outright. The Catholic Church is not now and never has been unqualifiedly inimcial to the public schools. There are, of course, individual Catholics, and even Catholic papers, holding ultra views on the subject, but you have no more right to hold the Church, as such, responsible for the private opinion of a few individuals, than we have to hold the Methodist Church to account for the utterances of the Rev. Mr. Williamson. Very many of our leading Catholics, clerical and lay, throughout the country, have been educated in the public schools, and we have never heard any of them say a word against these schools as far as they go. We say as far as they go, for the unwillingness of Catholic parents to send their children to the public schools is based, not on what these schools teach, but rather on what they fail to teach. In a land like ours, where church and state are separate and with such a multiplicity of sects, all intelligent Catholics recognize not only the utility, but also the necessity, of the common school. They realize, too, the difficulty of adopting a system that would prove satisfactory to all. Still, no right-thinking person can deny that in the matter of education, the public schools go only half way. This is clear to anyone who knows the definition of education, which consists not merely in secular instruction, or book learning, but in the development of all the faculties. There can be no such thing as a complete education without the proper development of the moral and religious sense. We have, then, no fault to find with the public schools as far as they go, but they do not go far enough for us. And that's nobody's business but our own. It's a matter of conscience, and to blame us for it is nothing short of rank intolerance. We are not, I repeat, unreservedly hostile to the public schools. Our position with respect to them is like that of Christ, who came not to destroy, but to perfect, the law. No number of garbled extracts, or verbatim quotations torn from their context can alter the facts.

Anent Mr. W's second point: the desire of the Catholics to obtain a just portion of the school funds, he is perfectly correct. Bear in mind that Catholics are doubly taxed in the matter of education. They must support their own schools, and at the same time contribute to the support of the public schools which they cannot in conscience use. All that we contend for, is that where there are enough Catholic children to fill a school, the Catholics get their pro-rata share of taxes for its support. Where is the unreasonableness in such a demand? It would entail no extra burden on the State. It is the system adopted by the British government in Canada, and has been working there successfully for many of years. We don't resort to "intrigue, intimidation" or any underhand methods to reach our end. We are perfectly open and above-board about it, for we have nothing to be ashamed of. We recognize that our Methodist brethren have the same right, if they wish to avail themselves of it.

In the third place, it is not the Bible that Catholics object to, but the reading of a corrupt and emasculated version of the Bible—the Bible of the so-called reformers of the 16th, century, who dropped a number of the books regarded as canonical by the vast body of Christians for many ages, and gave us instead what might almost be termed the play of Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark left out. Let them read the genuine Bible, the Bible of our fathers, and we will be delighted. We haven't even any objection to the reading of the garbled version to those who care to hear it, but we won't have our children forced to drink in error.

The reverend gentleman goes out of his way to inform us that the Catholic church is not only averse to the reading of the Protestant Bible in the schools, but hostile to the Bible generally. As we wouldn't for an instant suspect a minister of the gospel of truth and love of deliberately uttering a foul calumny, we must charitably attribute his mistake to dense ignorance. Where, in the name of God, did he get his Bible anyhow? Had it not been for the Catholic monks of the "Dark Ages" who spent their lives transcribing the sacred books, there wouldn't be a Bible in the world today. According to this zealous defender of truth, the Catholic holds "that the Bible is a sectarian book," and he puts the words within quotation marks, as though he had drawn them from some authoritative source. Fudge! Tommyrot! No responsible Catholic ever gave voice to such an asinine utterance. We have neither the time nor the space to pursue this matter further, but we would refer the reverend gentleman to any ordinary work on Catholic apologetics, such as Cardinal Gibbons' "Faith of Our Fathers," where he can find the truth if he wants it.

"Leo XIII," says Mr. Williamson, "was the author of the following: 'Furthermore, in politics which are inseparably bound up with the laws of morality and religious duty, men ought always, and in the first place, to serve, as far as possible, the interests of Catholicism.'" I haven't the document at hand, and consequently cannot say whether the Pope is correctly quoted or not; but, taking the thing as it stands, what, I ask, is wrong with it? Didn't Christ Himself tell us to "render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's"? And which comes first, God or Caesar? It is a recognized principle of ethics—recognized in civil, as well as in moral, law—that, in a conflict of rights, the lower must yield to the higher. When man-made laws clash with the laws of God, the human must give place to the Divine. In the words of St. Peter to the Sanhedrin, "We must obey God rather than man." We are greatly surprised that a man claiming to be a representative of God should think for a moment of calling the truth in question.

Mr. W. tells us that he found these words in a "Catholic paper;" "We hold education to be a function of the Church, not of the State." We have no means of ascertaining what paper it might be, and besides no Catholic paper claims infallibility, nor is any Catholic paper the official organ of the Catholic church. And his "Catholic paper" to the contrary notwithstanding, Catholics do not deny that the State has a perfect right to educate within its own sphere—that is, of course, in secular matters. If the reverend gentleman will take the trouble to read the discussion between Dr. Bouquillon, late of the Catholic University, and Father Holaind, S. J., on the "Right of the State to educate the Child," he may have his eyes opened on the subject. "But the Catholic position says, 'the State has nothing to do with religious education.'" Aye, verily, of a truth it does. And, strange to say, so does the State itself. This principle is of the very essence of the American Constitution. O, fie, Mr. Williamson! Did you ever hear this before? "Etiam aliquando dormitat bonus Homerus."

"Wherever in this country our public schools have gone into the hands of Roman Catholic officials, their usefulness and power have been lessened." How know you that, O wise Daniel? How many years have you spent in a thorough, conscientious investigation of the schools throughout the length and breadth of this great land, to justify you in making such a sweeping assertion? Where are your proofs? You know "quod gratis asseritur, gratis negatur." To perpetrate an Irish bull, your proofs are no proofs at all. They won't hold water. And, of course, your conclusion is of a piece with them. The best answer that can be given you is a reference to the facts in the case. The best proof that Catholics can be loyal to their church and, at the same time, faithful to their duty as public school teachers or officials, is the undeniable fact that they are so. In every important city of this country we find a large proportion of practical Catholics, regular communicants, connected with the public schools, and with the exception of an occasional biased individual like yourself, who has an axe to grind, no one questions their efficiency or their loyalty. Nor have they ever attempted to force the reading of the Catholic Bible on their non-Catholic pupils. If they did, oh, what a howl would go up!

In conclusion, it may be worth remarking that there is nothing new or original in your charges. They are a rehash of the old wornout libels that have been uttered time and time again, usque ad nauseam, and answered repeatedly to the satisfaction of every impartial, sincere seeker after truth.

JAMES E. CONNELL,
Pastor of St. Peter's.

Does Mr. Warner Measure Up to Constitutional Requirements?

To the Editor of The Republican:

The Republicans of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland will, indeed, have a very important matter to settle on the 30th day of August, 1910, in the Primary Election, viz., the selection of a candidate for Congress to make a successful fight against the Democracy in November. The candidate we select must fully measure up to the necessary requisites as a man and citizen of Maryland, against whom the least objections can be made. He must be free of factional difficulties in his party, he must be an inhabitant of Maryland, according to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, and he must be sufficiently associated with the people of the Sixth Congressional District that he may know their wants and needs. These qualifications are absolutely essential and not one of them can be eliminated. The Constitution of the United States, Section 2, reads: "No person shall be a member of the House of Representatives who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." Therefore, no person can reside in any other state, territory or district and be a member or Congress from Maryland. This is too plain for comment. The Constitution of the United States is supreme. Talk, clap-trap and circuitous argument to the contrary notwithstanding.

What constitutes an inhabitant or resident? Judge Story, one of the greatest judges this country ever produced, tells us that the domicile, or residence, of a person is where he has his true, fixed, permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning. In the case of Thomas vs. Warner, 83 Md., at page 19, Judge Bryan says: (This case involved the right of the father of B. H. Warner, Jr., now one of the Republican candidates seeking the nomination for Congress in this district, to be entitled to be a resident of Montgomery county, Md., and which the Court denied to him). "If Mr. Warner had broken up his establishment in Washington, abandoned his residence there, and made his home in Montgomery county, there could have been no question about the matter It must, however, always appear that the former residence has been abandoned. There must be an actual acquisition of a new abode." In Schaeffer vs. Gilbert, 73 Md., page 65, residence there as defined under the Constitution, means one's actual home in the sense of having no other home. Bouviers' law dictionary, Vol. 1, page 709, defines who a resident is as follows: one who has an actual, fixed residence in a place. Now let us apply these fixed principles to the case of Mr. B. H. Warner, Jr., who is asking the Republicans of the Sixth Congressional District to send him to Congress. Has he a residence in Montgomery county in the sense of having no other home? Does he not live with his father, at 2100 Massachusetts avenue, near Dupont Circle, Washington, D. C.? He practices law in the city of Washington exclusively, owns no real estate in Montgomery county, pays no taxes in the Sixth Congressional District, and all of his business interests are in the city of Washington. Do not all of these facts convince any reasonable man, according to the decisions above referred to, make him a citizen of the District of Columbia, and not eligible, if elected, to represent this district in Congress, according to the Constitution of the United States?

In his answer to a letter written by Sixth District Republican, published in the Morning Herald, at Hagerstown, on July 27th, he says: "Permit me to say that my residence is at Kensington, at the home of my father, and where we spend most of our time. It is true that the premises, 2100 Mass. Ave., near Dupont Circle, Washington, D. C., belongs to the Warners, but for the past fifteen years my circumstances have been such that it was impossible for me to stay there, 1st, because my time is not always my own, and 2nd, the said premises is too small to accommodate all the Warners. When not at Kensington, however, it is necessary for me to find some place to room and board." He offers no facts, in his letter, as to how he acquired his residence in Kensington, or how long he remains there any one period during a year, or nothing showing what his interests are, his business or any other circumstance necessary to constitute a legal residence as defined by law.

Mr. Warner, Jr., being an unmarried man, with no family, resides with his father in Washington whose own right as a citizen of Maryland was denied him by the Court of Appeals of Maryland. His father at that time did own real estate in Montgomery county, while the son, the aspirant for Congress, owns none. His father's case was, therefore, a stronger one than the son's. He admits that his law offices are in the city of Washington, and he expects to have them there as long as he is engaged in active practice. He is not a member of the Maryland bar, has no offices in Kensington and is engaged in no business there. He says that he and his father spend most of their time at his father's home in Kensington. Of course he would have you believe that the $75,000 palatial residence, owned by the Warners near Dupont Circle, Washington, is practically abandoned by his father and himself and their modest home, costing a few thousand dollars, at Kensington, Montgomery county, is the real home of the father and son. Does any one seriously consider that as a fact? Don't we all know that rich men have their permanent homes in the cities and their summer homes in the country? This is undoubtedly the case with the Warners.

The writer has been reliably informed that Mr. Warner's father is not now a qualified, registered voter in Montgomery county. If not, why not? Is it because Mr. Warner, Sr., believes he is not entitled to register, or is it lack of interest? If the former, then the single son with whom he resides is not, either. If father and son both live in Kensington in the same house, why should one be registered and the other not? Mr. Warner, Jr. says he has to find a place to room and board when he is not at Kensington. Where is this place? He did not, in his letter, tell the people of the Sixth District where it is.

Are the Republicans of the Sixth District willing to run the risk of nominating a candidate for Congress under these facts and circumstances, when the Constitution of the United States says: "No person shall be a Representative in Congress who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State from which he shall be chosen? Don't they know that such a risk is dangerous? Suppose after his nomination someone applies to the registration officers to have his name erased from the poll books, and his name is erased, he must appeal, as in his father's case, and the action of the register is sustained, what will become of Mr. Warner's candidacy? It will be too late to get another. The election will be over and a Democrat will hold the office. Don't you know this? Don't you know, Republicans, that the Democrats are going to take advantage of every scheme and device to elect a representative from the Sixth District this fall? The National Democratic party will leave nothing undone to secure the lower house of Congress this year and much talk is already around that the next House of Representatives will be Democratic. Many influential persons believe it will be. If so, and Mr. Warner, Jr., after being elected, is stricken from the register in his county, and applies to the House of Representatives for admission, what chance do you suppose he will have to be seated? Why, none in the world. The result of it all would be that the Republicans of the Sixth District will find themselves in a beautiful situation, with a Democrat representing them, whose vote may change the complexion of the entire House and block administration legislation for the next two years. Why run all this risk? Have you not a candidate from your midst, whose residence cannot be questioned, because he has lived in the Sixth District twenty-seven years, who knows the wants of its people, whose life you know as an open book, with whose every deed you are familiar, who is free from factional difficulties in his party, and who, if nominated, will be elected, and will take his seat in the next Congress. This gentleman is Alexander R. Hagner, of Hagerstown, Washington county, Md. Let the Republicans of the Sixth District take these facts into serious consideration and cast their votes on August 30th for Mr. Hagner who will make an ideal representative in Congress from the old Sixth District of Maryland.

SIXTH DISTRICT REPUBLICAN.

Why Not Display the Same Spirit?

To the Editor of The Republican:

Now that we all know that "Fair Play" is Supt. E. A. Browning, we want to quote from his first annual report to the State Board of Education in 1901 and ask him if he is displaying the same spirit of magnanimity to Prof. Palmer and his friends as they showed him then and all the years since?

The report above refered to follows:

"The litigation over the School Board question in our county, at the beginning of the year, somewhat complicated matters for a time. But after the decision of the court, and by the magnanimous co-operation and assistance of our predecessors, we are able to report a very successful year in our schools."

VOLUME 34. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, AUGUST 18, 1910. NUMBER 25

A MINSTREL SHOW

Will Be Given at Mt. Lake Park Next Thursday Night.

The entertainment to be held at the Auditorium in Mt. Lake Park, on Thursday, Aug. 25, promises to be one of unusual merit.

The chorus of fifty is being trained by Mrs. Elsie Fisher Kincheloe, a well known musician of Wheeling, W. Va., where a similar entertainment, managed by her, was given last winter with overwhelming success.

Mr. Herman C. Rakemann, who will have charge of the instrumental music, has for years led the orchestra in the Belasco Theatre in Washington, besides being connected with the Symphony Orchestra, so that a very great musical treat, as well as the fun of the minstrels, is in store for those who attend.

But even if this were not the case, it would be the part of wisdom for the people of Oakland and its vicinity to patronize the entertainment. The object of the Woman's Civic Club of Mt. Lake Park, under whose auspices it is given, is to establish and maintain golf links, to build good tennis courts, to do landscape gardening, and, in short, to make of Mt. Lake Park such a summer resort as will permanently attract substantial people.

There is not a farmer in Garrett county who would not be helped by the betterment of that market, nor a business man in Oakland who should be indifferent to these improvements. We bespeak for the entertainment a very large audience.

Have School Patrons Any Rights?

To the Editor of The Republican:

As a patron of the Oakland school, I am vitally interested in its welfare, and my interest arises through the training my children are to receive there. The vital question for the parents to consider, in my judgment, is this: have they any rights, connected with the education of their children, that the School Board is bound to recognize?

If the School Board is a law unto itself, and if its dictum is final upon all matters which it undertakes to decide, the people of Oakland are reduced to a pitiable condition, indeed.

But I do not believe that this is the case, and further, I do not believe the State Board of Education will hold, if the matter is properly laid before them, that we are compelled to submit to the arbitrary determination of the local Board.

I believe the State Board will decide that the wishes of the patrons of the school are entitled to the first consideration and that when they indicate, as they have in this instance, what their wishes are, so far as the incumbency of the principalship is concerned, the action or the local Board will be overruled and the will of the people be allowed to rule. PATRON.

MR. GIST BLAIR THE ADMINISTRATION CANDIDATE

Announces His Platform and Is Confident of Success.

(Special to The Republican.)

SILVER SPRING, MD.—With the withdrawal of George A. Pearre from the race for the Republican nomination for Congress Gist Blair, of this county, becomes the most formidable candidate for the honor of representing this district in Congress.

The fact that the administration has placed its stamp of approval upon the candidacy of Mr. Blair gives him a tremendous advantage. Not often does the President take an interest in a party primary fight but the exception was made in this instance on account of the great danger of losing the district to the Democrats in the November election.

The President looks upon Mr. Blair as being the best qualified candidate to carry the District in the general election and it was for that reason that he summoned him to Beverly and urged him to remain in the contest. Mr. Blair's inclination was to retire in the hope of contributing to party harmony, but the President disagreed.

As a result of the new conditions which have arisen in the Sixth District situation, Blair has set about organizing his forces in every county. He promises to make the most vigorous campaign during the next two weeks ever seen in a purely primary fight.

In carrying out this plan the Montgomery County candidate has announced his platform. He asks support upon the strength of his determination, if elected, to become the District's business as well as political agent. He says that he will divide his time between developing the resources of Western Maryland and voting and working for the things Western Maryland wants of Congress.

Speaking of the duties which the government owes to the Sixth District, Mr. Blair says every important town in it should have a postoffice building; that the Lincoln Memorial Highway should be built through the western counties and that Congress should authorize the erection of a fuel testing plant in Allegany County. These are among the first things that he will work for, he adds.

Preaches in Church Which He Owns.

Arthur H. Miles, a colored blacksmith, who conducts a smithy on Clay street, Meyersdale, has purchased for $1,000 cash the old Brethren church on Main street, Meyersdale, and has set it apart as a house of worship for his own race. Miles is a lay preacher and works at his trade during the week, preaching on Sunday. Miles is an ardent Methodist of the old school. He stands unique in owning the church in which he preaches. The edifice was the home of the Brethren Congregation which outgrew it. Miles is determined that the structure, once dedicated to religious uses, shall be used for no other purpose.

GREAT GATHERING OF BROADWATERS

Perhaps Sixteen Hundred Attended Annual Rennion of Garrett County Family.

If the Broadwaters annual reunions in years past have been successes, the one held Saturday was a double success and an extraordinary gathering. The picnic was held at Merrill's Grove, the same place as last year, but where about 800 attended last year, the number on this occasion was nearly double. Doubtless in this country can be found another clan which can muster together so many under one name. There was an air of prosperity and contentment evident in everything that transpired. For days the good women had been preparing for the big dinner and feast and last week the men were in Lonaconing with their teams and could be seen loading up with many good things and an abundance of everything was provided. No one went away hungry. It was the feeding of the multitude. Instrumental and vocal music were among the day's enjoyments. Among the visitors from other places were the following: Dr. George Sloan, of North Yakima, Washington; Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Broadwater and Miss Sophia Broadwater, of Minnesota; Mrs. Rachael Boucher, of Centreville, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Ellithorp, of Bittinger, Garrett county; Mr. Duncan Sloan, Mr. and Mrs. George Spear and Mr. and Mrs. Fred Weber and Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Fazenbaker, of Lonaconing.

Mr. Duncan R. Sloan made an address on the conservation of our land and why the boys should stay on the farm. Mr. N. U. Bond, of the firm of DuBois & Bond Bros., lumber dealers, spoke on the subject of the Broadwater family as citizens and neighbors and related some experiences in connection with the family. Mr. Bond stated that he had been associated in business with the family for eight years, the property of twelve of the Broadwaters bordering on that of the DuBois & Bond Company, and then paid the high compliment that in all their dealings he has had no occasion for a disagreement or law suit. This was not told for effect, but a fact given in deep earnestness since the operations of Mr. Bond's company are finished in that section.

Last year a remarkable picture was made of twelve children of the late Amos Broadwater, six sons and six daughters, Mr. Amos Broadwater dying a few years ago at the age of 97 years.

The children are: Mrs. Henry Green, aged 83 years; William, 81; John, 80; Mrs. Jefferson Green, 79; Jefferson, 74; Mrs. Simon Green, 71; Mrs. Peter Bittinger, 70; Amos, 66; Mrs. Jacob Blocher, 64; David, 62; Mrs. Peter Stevens, 59, and Eli, 57. Besides these there are 98 grandchildren and over a hundred great-grandchildren and many great-great-grandchildren.

The Broadwaters are of English descent and those coming to this country first settled in Virginia before the revolutionary war. Two of them served in this war and two in the war of 1812, at the close of which they walked to the Little Savage river from Baltimore. They left Virginia because of the slavery question and settled in Garrett county, Amos Broadwater and Samuel Beeman coming together and building a log shanty on the Little Savage, and having no tools with which to construct a door they used a blanket for that purpose for a year. Last year about 800 people were present, representing four states, Virginia, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Maryland. One can scarcely meet a farmer in Garrett county that is not a Broadwater or some kin. The annual dinner to which hundreds sat down Saturday was all that the farmers' wives with their bountiful provisions could make it.

School Betterment and Not Creed the Issue.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I regret that our school matter has drifted into a discussion of the merits of Roman Catholicism vs. Protestantism, for I do not believe anything of value to either side of such a controversy will come out of the discussion.

I believe that the religous question was injected into the matter with the purpose of drawing the attention of the people away from the real issue.

The patrons of the Oakland school petitioned the School Board in overwhelming numbers to retain Mr. Palmer as principal of the High School. The School Board without reason, so far as the people know, turned down their petition and elected another to that position. The puny explanation offered by the School Board a short while ago did not contain a single reason satisfying to any patron of the school for its action, and therefore I am justified in saying that what the Board did was without reason to the people. Perhaps the reasons advanced by the President of the School Board in the article which appeared over his signature two or three weeks ago were all satisfying to that august body, but I have yet to hear a single patron of the school agree that the action of the Board, in turning down the modest request of the people even upon its own showing, was justified.

Don't let us get away from the issue. Let us keep the main question to the front, and renew and keep on renewing the question of the right of petition until we get a satisfactory answer from the School Board as to why it turned down and ignored the expressed wish of the people as to who should preside over the educational interests of their children. WATER TRAIN IN SERVICE

Baltimore and Ohio Compelled to Haul Supply from Oakland.

The water train, composed of a number of tank cars, has again been placed on the road by the B. & O. for the purpose of hauling water from the Oakland pumping station to points west, including Terra Alta and Hutton, and according to officials of the road if the drought continues an additional train will have to be placed in service to supply water for engines at Rowlesburg, the river water at that point being unfit for use when it gets at a low stage.

For two or three years past the B. & O. has been put to great expense and inconvenience in supplying water for its engines at points west of Oakland. The water used here as well as that hauled away is drawn from the Little Yough.

BITTINGER.

Samuel E. Broadwater, of New Germany, one of the general assessors, recently appointed by Governor Crothers, was here one day last week and while here qualified, preparatory to beginning the duties of his office.

Mr. and Mrs. Joel Orendorf spent last Sunday with their daughter, Mrs. Earle Stanton, near Grantsville.

Mrs. Jane Boucher, of Rockwood, Pa., spent a day or two last week with relatives at this place.

State Senator Harvey J. Speicher, of Accident, passed through this village last Sunday morning in his new automobile. The Senator was accompanied by his wife and children.

Miss Sophia Broadwater, of Preston, Minn., who spent several weeks with relatives here, left for her western home last Sunday.

John Holman, of Friendsville, was the guest of Miss Lizzie Orendorf last Friday evening.

Miss Myrtle Wiley, of Cumberland, is spending this week with her parents at this place.

Daniel D. Brenneman, a farmer aged more than eighty years, residing near this village, was accidentally shot in the leg by a sportsman from Pittsburg, who was hunting in the woods near Mr. Brenneman's home last Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Yommer, of Jennings, spent last Saturday night in this village, the guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Ellithorp.

Arrangements have been made to have three prominent ministers present at the S. S. picnic which will be held on next Saturday, August 20th, and all who will attend may expect a treat in the way of speaking.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The excursion from William, W. Va., Saturday last brought about two hundred people, accompanied by a brass band. The entire expense was borne by Mr. Richard Chaffee, "Uncle Dick," as his employees call him. They remained all day, leaving after the evening program.

The excursion Tuesday was not large, but a number of people from the surrounding neighborhood took in the program, which was a good one, that day.

Next Wednesday, "National Day," will be the great day of the season. The program on that day will be especially strong and a great crowd is expected. At 2.30 Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson will lecture on "America's Mission as Peace Maker Among the Nations," with a Grand Closing Concert in the evening and ending with the usual display of fireworks.

There is now and has been for a week or ten days in the upper section of town, a serious shortage in the water supply. This condition of affairs occurs every summer and is extremely annoying.

We now have the greatest crowd ever on these grounds.

The Epworth League Institute, under the direction of Dr. E. M. Randall, will convene August 22nd and continue until the evening of the 28th. It is expected that this will be a very interesting and helpful convention.

Mr. and Mrs. U. A. Clayton will soon occupy their cottage here.

Dr. Davidson, a co-worker with Dr. Ostrom, preached to a large congregation in the M. E. church Sunday night.

Next Sunday services in the M. E. church will be as follows: Class meeting at 10.00 a. m.; Sunday School at 2.30 p. m., preaching at 8.15 p. m. by Dr. Stroup.

Primary Election.

By reference to the advertising columns of THE REPUBLICAN today it will noticed that the Board of Election Supervisors make the required publications of the ballots and notice of election as required under the the new primary election law. This law places the holding of the primaries under the same provisions as are observed in a general elections and the same protection is afforded the voter. There will be two ballots, however, instead of one, as at the general election, one containing the names of the Republican candidates and the other the names of the Democratic candidates. The Republican ballots will be printed on pink paper and Democratic ballots will be white.

To Build $75,000 Church.

Holbert & Spedden, a Fairmont contracting firm, has been awarded the contract for the erection of the new Methodist Episcopal church at Fairmont. The contract price is not given, but the edifice will cost in the neighborhood of $75,000. The building is to be completed within twelve months. It will be erected on a lot at Fairmont avenue and Fourth street.

PEARRE RETIRES FROM THE CONGRESSIONAL CONTEST

Announces His Withdrawal in Letter to The American.

Washington, August 15.—Col. George A. Pearre was in Washington this evening and in a letter to The American announced his retirement from the contest for the nomination for Congress in the Sixth Maryland district.

Mr. Pearre said that he had come to this conclusion after a deliberate consideration, realizing that after serving his district and state for six consecutive terms (12 years), it was about time for him to look out for himself and return to his law practice. Mr. Pearre declined to talk of his action, saying he had said all he desired to say at present in his letter announcing his withdrawal. The letter is as follows:

Editor of The Baltimore American:

Dear Sir—Will you kindly state to the public through your columns my withdrawal as a candidate for the Republican nomination for Congress in the Sixth District of Maryland?

After considering the matter well, I have determined that, out of consideration for the interest of the party and my own welfare, it is wise that I should withdraw from this contest.

During my 15 years of political activity and service to my party and the people, I have been compelled to neglect my personal affairs, and now find that it is imperative that I should give them more care than the unremitting devotion which I have given to the public interests ever since I have been in public office will permit. Moreover, the people of the Sixth District of Maryland and my party have so unusually honored me by sending me to the Congress of the United States as their representative for more successive terms than any one who has ever represented this district heretofore that I feel that, in return for their confidence, I owe an obligation to my party which at this time can most happily be met by my withdrawal from this fight.

Although I have been unfortunate enough to incur decided opposition upon the part of those who have been anxious to succeed me, and who through a number of unsuccessful campaigns for the nomination have sought to create animosities against me among the people, I find, from a very careful review of the district, that I still enjoy to as great degree as anyone could expect the confidence of the disinterested and patriotic citizens of the Sixth district of Maryland.

Retiring from active political life at this time, I carry with me this comforting conviction and shall ever feel grateful to my party and my fellow citizens for the unusual honors which have been bestowed upon me by the fair minded and patriotic citizens of the best congressional district in the state of Maryland.

(Signed) GEORGE A. PEARRE.

KILLED IN MARYLAND MINES

Miners and Operators Co-Operative Association To Pay Benefits.

Mr. John Donahue, State Mine Inspector, on Friday, signed the relief papers of two who were killed last month in Maryland mines. The signing of these grants is necessary before those benefitted have the privilege of receiving the $1500 allowed to the survivors of those who meet death by accident in the mines. The money is supplied by the Miners and Operators Co-Operative Association and is disbursed by the County Treasurer upon order of the County Commissioners.

Mr. Samuel B. Taylor, of Garrett county, who was injured on June 3rd, at Dodson, and who three days later died in the Western Maryland hospital, was one of the victims. He left no immediate family and the money will be divided as the administrator directs. The other man was Cleaver Poole, who was instantly killed on the Potomac Valley tipple on July 13th. His wife, Mrs. Gertrude Poole, receives the total in this case. It is in such cases as the last named that the benefit of the existence of such a relief fund is most clearly seen.

Mrs. Poole has been left with her three little children, and while money cannot compensate for her loss, still the sum derived from the relief fund will go far towards alleviating the struggles of the widow in keeping her little flock together. A woman suddenly forced in this manner to meet the world is facing a great responsibility, which even with the aid of a good sized sum of money is most too great for a lone woman to bear. What aspect would this predicament assume if she were suddenly forced into this fight without perhaps the aid of a penny and with a family of small children demanding a mother's care.

Would Put It Before the Governor.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I understand the School Board held a meeting recently at which no action was taken looking to the ratification of what the great majority of the patrons of the Oakland School regard as a serious blunder on the part of the Board in turning down the petition of the people for the retention of Prof. Palmer as the principal of the school.

From all that I can gather, it would now appear that the School Board considers it a piece of effrontry on the part of the people, and that such has been its position all along, for them to think for a moment that they had any rights which the Board was required to respect or give consideration to in this matter. If such be the views of the School Board, it seems to me it is time that an appeal were made to a higher power and let the State Board pass upon the matter, and then, if the people cannot secure their rights, put it up to the Governor and let us find out if he is the friend and protector of the people.

Why not ask the Governor to remove the School Board from office? Let him say whether they have transcended their authority or not, and if they have, then let them be replaced with men who will respect the wishes of the people.

In other words, let us eliminate the last vestige of politics from our school, and let it be conducted with the sole and single purpose of giving the children of Oakland the very best advantages possible, regardless of politics, politicians, political bosses, family connections and religious affiliations and beliefs.

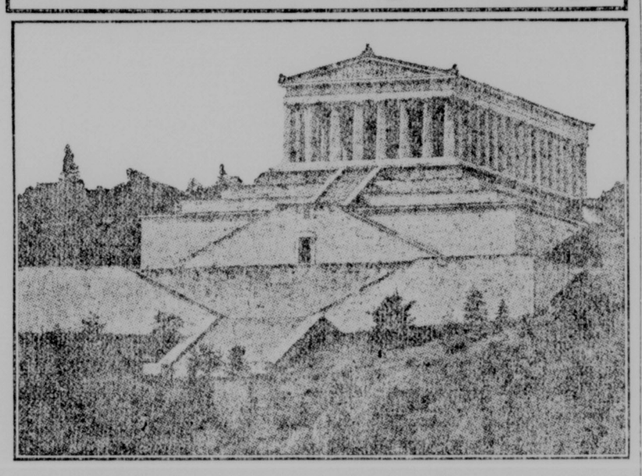
The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

Walhalla of King Ludwig



About eight miles from Ratisbon, on a hill 1,348 feet above the sea-level, stands the Walhalla, the German hall of fame, a magnificent marble temple erected by King Ludwig I.

From the stately portico lies a view unsurpassed in Germany for the distance it commands and the varying charm of its landscape. In the background are dark slopes of the Bavarian forests, and below and around is a stretch of country so level it would seem as if a great plane had been run over it. Through this fertile, flat ground runs the Danube, and in the distance are the towns Donaustauf and Ratisbon.

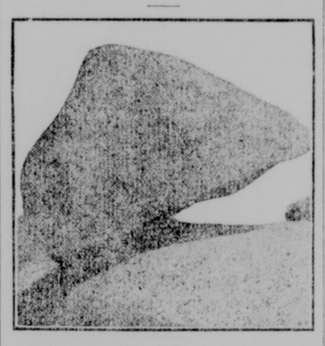
The Walhalla is modeled after the Parthenon at Athens. The material is of gray marble, but so light in color as to be almost white, and its massive fluted columns, 52 of them, each 30 feet high, show with classic grace against the wooded hills and blue sky. The building is long and high which produces an interior spacious and stately.

Though busts, figures and tablets are of white marble, a pleasing warm tone is introduced into various parts. The coffered bronze ceiling has platinum blue stars and the marble mosaic pavement has a tone of brown, while the walls are faced with reddish-brown marble. Suporting the richly adorned architrave are 14 warrior-maids of the ancient Teutonic paradise, wearing blue robes edged with gold. Around the halls are great, white marble chairs, tall candelabra and graceful Victorias, the latter by Rauch.

King Ludwig ruled impartially over his Temple of Fame. While none but illustrious guests were admitted to his marble house, greatness was alone the open sesame. Albertus Magnus stands opposite to Martin Luther and Kant to Saint Boniface. Marble busts of 104 celebrated Germans are in place. The last three added are those of William I., Bismarck and Moltke.

But great genius does not leave always a portrait to admiring posterity. To perpetuate the identity of these unphotographed celebrities, King Ludwig raised tablets—61 of them. And he went still farther when he placed monumental scrolls to the memory of three great men whose names are known only by their achievements. One is the architect of the Cologne catherral. Altogether it is a royal company of fighters, thinkers, musicians, painters, writers, preachers, rulers, each one a king among men.

ROCKING STONE OF TANDIL



One of the curiosities of nature to be seen in Argentina is the rocking stone of Tandil, 205 miles from Buenos Ayres, on the Southern railway. The stone measures 13 feet in height by 16 in diameter and, apparently, is balanced on the crest of a huge mass of solid rock. The phenomenon is explained by the fact of a circular protrusion on the under side of the stone which, fitting snugly into a depression in the foundation, holds it in place. A strong wind causes it to oscillate perceptibly.

MODEL CHILDREN'S HOME

No problem more puzzling than that of the destitute child confronts the practical sociologist; and perhaps no single branch of philanthropy has succeeded less in approximating the institution to the home.

Iona, Minn., possesses a home for destitute children that in many respects is unusual. Both boys and girls are cared for. No child is ever given out to be adopted. When a boy reaches the age of twenty-one he leaves the home and boards out. Girls remain until they marry or take up some calling that leads them elsewhere.

When a boy is sixteen he starts to work. Many of the girls teach school, coming to the home every Friday and remaining there until Monday. There are no uniforms, and no unnecessary rules, the intention being to make the home as nearly like a family home as possible.

The children are allowed to invite friends to meals or to stay over night occasionally, and after attaining to the dignity of seventeen years they are permitted to return these visits. Thus they lose the feeling that they are "inmates" of an institution and enjoy some of the advantages of real home life.

Every boy and girl becomes self-supporting, and the records of this unique establishment are signal testimonials to its success.

"MILE ROCK" LIGHT.

One of the most conclusive proofs of the great strength and resistance endurance of structural steel and reenforced concrete, combined, is shown by the "Mile Rock" light station. This little pharos stands as a beacon light sentinel at the southern entrance to San Francisco harbor—the Golden Gate. It has only been recently completed. Literally, the light station is firmly anchored on the ragged pinnacle of a rock which, at extreme high tide, was almost entirely covered with water. A broad rim, or shelf was slowly chiseled out around the rock, some distance below the sharp and jagged points. A huge elliptically shaped cylinder of boiler steel five-eighth of an inch in thickness, was built up from this shelf. This cylinder was 40 feet high and 40x25 feet in diameter. It was fitted so as to cover the ragged tops of the rock. All the space inclosed by the huge cylinder was filled with strongly re-enforced concrete. This material settled down all over and between the ragged points of the rocks, and, when the material was thoroughly set, the whole mass became as one solid stone, thus furnishing an impregnable foundation and fortress against the fury of winds and waves.

All of the upper part of the station is of strong structural steel—massively braced and riveted. The lower ends of the steel skeleton are deeply imbedded—anchored, into the top of the concrete cylinder. From mean tide level, the light is just 100 feet above the water. The total cost to the government of the station was $100,000. One whole year was required to complete the work. This was very largely due to the great engineering difficulties, and danger involved in the construction; and also to the small force of men which could only be employed at a time to any advantage. So perilous was the work, that it was with no little difficulty the contractor could secure a sufficient force of cement rock, and steel structural workers. Work on the lower part of the structure could only progress during calm weather, and on ebb tide. For days at a stretch no work could be done at all. The landing of material was always attended with great difficulties and peril and slowness. However, there was no loss of life, nor even serious accident during the progress of the work.

HAS A CHAMPION MUSTACHE

STRANGE RAIN OF SULPHUR

A strange fall of rain occurred at Wiener, in Germany, during the course of a recent thunderstorm. After the storm the roads were left powdered with sulphur and the air was pervaded with a strong sickly odor.

The phenomenon, which caused a panic, was generally ascribed to the comet. The meteorological authorities, however, consider that the sulphur was carried by clouds from some distant volcano.

STRANGE PAIR OF TWINS.

The birth of an extraordinary pair of twins has aroused considerable interest among members of the medical profession in Vienna and district, owing to the remarkable development of the infants, which were born to a gipsy woman near Brunn recently. Both children are normally developed in the upper parts, but there is only one pair of legs, while from the back what appears to be a third leg has grown, with six distinct toes. Both infants are alive and well.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

COL. LOCKE ON TEMPERANCE

Regards Restrictive Laws as Only Intended for Temporary Check—Sums Up Situation.

Illustrative of the thought which individual citizens are giving to the temperance movement is the following expression of opinion from Col. Frank L. Lock, president of the Boston Young Men's Christian union. When asked to sum up the causes of the present day situation, Mr. Locke said:

"The recent very noticeable interest in the effort for temperance legislation indicates, I think, that people are beginning to realize the extent to which intemperance reaches into and affects the every-day life of the community.

"To those having at heart the interest of the city, the state and the nation this awakening to the evil of the situation and the interest manifested even by those who are not total abstainers must be gratifying. While the present prohibitory legislation may not offer a final solution of the problem, it clearly indicates that the people are generally aroused as to the seriousness of the situation and are led to take any action which will tend to improve conditions, even if it be only to temporarily check the evil until further investigation and the application of modern scientific methods of study any analysis may offer a more satisfactory solution.

"The increased adoption of laws prohibiting the sale of liquor does not, I think, signify a growing conviction that such is the only wise or proper solution of the liquor problem, but that it is a temporary check, and helpful, until a better means is at hand. The study of modern conditions in our penal institutions and of the general social condition, leads more and more to a realization that the remedy for these public ills lies not in attempting to administer punishment, or to make cures for the damage which has been done, but rather in adopting measures that will prevent the occurrence of the difficulties. More and more it is coming to be felt that inebriety as well as, indeed, most of the criminal offences, are due to some defective mental condition rather than to deliberate disposition to be bad or mean.

"The treatment of the drunkard, as well as the criminal generally, is becoming more and more to be looked upon as necessarily more of a hospital treatment. The success which has tended the work at the State hospital at Foxboro along this line is interesting.

"In connection with the forward movement for temperance, I wish that more effort might be made to provide, amid proper surroundings, the sociability and good-fellowship which is found in the saloon. This sociability and good-fellowship are, to my mind, quite as much the attraction to the saloon as the liquor."

ALCOHOL AID TO PNEUMONIA

Well Known Clinical Fact That Users of Liquor Fare Badly When Attacked by Disease.

It is a well-known clinical fact that those addicted to the use of alcohol fare very badly when attacked by pneumonia. Indeed, the mortality among drinkers is very high in every disease; but is especially marked in pneumonia. Dr. Julius Pohlman was struck by this fact, and in order to test it performed a number of experiments he has recorded in the Medical News.

Pneumonia is considered by the best authorities as an infectious disease, and, from its organisms, there is supposed to spread through the system a toxine, called pneumo-toxine, against which weak bodies struggle with great difficulty, or in vain, says Health. The disease is more than a mere congestion of the lungs. Dr. Pohlman, in his experiments, took some strong and lusty dogs, and injected into the trachea, just below the larynx of each one, some pure alcohol, and noted the effect.

His work seems to have been done rather unscientifically, but his conclusions agree with clinical experience, although of much less value. However, his work will give the anti-vivisectionists something to talk about.

His theory is that, if to a congestion of the lungs brought on by alcohol a pneumonia be added, the individual stands little chance of recovering.

While the study of the blood serum in pneumonia has not advanced quite as far and to such practical results as in diphtheria, still it is pretty well agreed that during an attack of acute lobar pneumonia there is in circulation in the blood a certain substance which may be called pneumo-toxine, which in fatal cases causes death, being disseminated all through the body with the blood, while the organisms, as a rule, in simple cases, stay in the lungs. In cases that recover from pneumonia there is noticed at the time of the crisis and after that there is a disappearance of pneumo-toxine from the blood, and there is found an antidote to it, which has been called anti-pneumo-toxine, and experiments with this anti-pneumo-toxine, from a convalescent patient injected subcutaneously into one very ill with pneumonia, have shown that the serum in this stage has some curative properties.

RAW ECZEMA ON HANDS

"I had eczema on my hands for ten years. I had three good doctors but none of them did any good. I then used one box of Cuticura Ointment and three bottles of Cuticura Resolvent and was completely cured. My hands were raw all over, inside and out, and the eczema was spreading all over my body and limbs. Before I had used one bottle, together with the Cuticura Ointment, my sores were nearly healed over, and by the time I had used the third bottle, I was entirely well. To any one who has any skin or blood disease I would honestly advise them to fool with nothing else, but get Cuticura and get well. My hands have never given me the least bit of trouble up to now.

"My daughter's hands this summer became perfectly raw with eczema. She could get nothing that would do them any good until she tried Cuticura. She used Cuticura Resolvent and Cuticura Ointment and in two weeks they were entirely cured. I have used Cuticura for other members of my family and it always proved successful. Mrs. M. E. Falin, Speers Ferry, Va., Oct. 19, 1909."

It Was the Other Way.

"Mr. Jones," said the senior partner in the wholesale dry goods house to the drummer who stood before him in the private office, "you have been with us for the past ten years."

"Yes, sir."

"And you ought to know the rules of the house. One of them is that no man of ours shall take a side line."

"But I have none, sir."

"But you have lately got married."

"Yes; but can you call that a side line, Mr. Jones?"

"Technically, it may not be."

A COOL PROPOSITION

And a Sure One.

The Body Does Not Feel Heat Unpleasantly if it has Proper Food—

Grape-Nuts

People can live in a temperature which feels from ten to twenty degrees cooler than their neighbors enjoy, by regulating the diet.

The plan is to avoid meat entirely for breakfast; use a goodly allowance of fruit, either fresh or cooked. Then follow with a saucer containing about four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, treated with a little rich cream. Add to this about two slices of crisp toast with a meager amount of butter, and one cup of well-made Postum.

By this selection of food the bodily energy is preserved, while the hot, carbonaceous foods have been left out. The result is a very marked difference in the temperature of the body, and to this comfortable condition is added the certainty of ease and perfect digestion, for the food being partially predigested is quickly assimilated by the digestive machinery.

Experience and experiment in food, and its application to the human body has brought out these facts. They can be made use of and add materially to the comfort of the user.

The TALLEST TREE THAT GROWS

By EDGERTON R. YOUNG

IN THESE days, when the reforesting of the waste lands of our country is becoming a question of such national importance, the study of the relative value of different species of trees is naturally very essential.

Scientific parties are scouring the earth in search for new plants, fruits and vegetables to add to our enjoyment and happiness. A good degree of success has already attended their efforts, and doubtless much more will yet be accomplished by them.

Owing to the rapidly increased price of timber and lumber, the matter of forest-growing is of vital interest to the great corporations like the railroads, manufacturing and building companies, that must have, for their very existence, vast quantities of timber and lumber. The timber required by the railroads for the one item of railroad ties, not taking into consideration the quantity used in the construction of cars and buildings, consumes the output of many hundreds of thousands of acres of timber lands every year.

While undoubtedly the valuable trees indigenous to America will be most largely replanted and utilized, many others that are not natives of this continent, when found by experiment to be easily grown and of value, will also be imported and largely cultivated.

In the case of the eucalyptus this has already been done, and so extensively is the tree now grown in California, and so many and valued are its uses, that it will be news to multitudes to hear that there still live many who remember when it was first brought into that state by the late Bishop Taylor from distant Australia, its original home.

It was a surprise, as well as a revelation, to find on our recent visit to Australia that in that far-away land, under the Southern Cross, were growing trees that towered in the air 150 feet higher than the great Sequoia, the famous red wood of our American west; and yet such is the fact, as some specimens of the Eucalyptus amygdalina reach to the great height of 480 feet. Specimens abound that are from 120 to 200 feet in circumference. They are practically of no use for commercial purposes, as the expense of cutting down such enormous trees and then getting their logs split up into pieces that can be handled is so great that these monsters are passed by the thrifty lumbermen for the smaller ones that are more easily handled.

The Eucalyptus amygdalina is the tallest, if not perhaps the largest, tree that grows. Specimens over 400 feet high are frequently found, while some have been measured towering up to 470 and 480 feet. The timber of these great specimens is easily worked, and, as it does not warp readily, is much used in carpentry.

The eucalyptus tree is a genus of trees and shrubs of the natural order of Myrtacea, embracing about 150 species. All but four of them are natives of Australia and Tasmania only. The eucalyptus trees are so abundant in many parts of Australia that over vast areas they are practically the only trees visible. The fact that the fully developed trees are destitute of symmetry and beauty robs the great Australian wooded regions of that attractiveness and charm which gives such pleasure and delight to the primeval forests of America.

One striking characteristic of several varieties of the eucalyptus is that, while they never seem to shed their leaves, they cast or slough off their bark in long strips every year. The leaves, which have a leathery appearance, contain a considerable quantity of volatile oil. The tincture or oil extracted from them has a bitter, aromatic taste and is extensively used as a remedy for various diseases.

On the young shoots of many species the leaves in pairs are opposite to each other, as they appear on ordinary plants, while on the older branches the leaves are arranged alternately and grow in such a way that they present their edges to the sun. This seems to be nature's provision to protect them from the intense heat of the tropical sun of those lands where they most flourish.

The Eucalyptus globulus, generally called the blue gum, from its bluish-green leaves, is the variety most successfully grown in California. It has also been introduced and flourishes in India, Natal, Egypt, Algeria, and in various parts of southern Europe and in some other warm countries. It cannot stand the frost, and so must be classed among tropical trees. Perhaps only in the state of Florida and California can we expect to see it in perfection in this country; yet although its introduction into California has been of but recent date, already its value to that state has been very considerable.

Some of the species of eucalyptus are much more valuable than others. There is also a great diversity both in their appearance and worth. One of the most valuable is the Eucalyptus marginata, popularly called the Jarrah wood. It grows to a great size and its timber is so hard that it is found to be especially valuable in the construction of wharves, as it resists the attack of the ship worms and borers that are so destructive to ordinary wood. Because of this quality it also enters largely into the construction of ships and is utilized in other marine uses.

Some varieties of the eucalyptus yield a kind of astringent gum or resin called Vino, while from others a species of manna—a hard little, sweet substance—is obtained in considerable quantities. As an antidote against malaria and as being valuable in warding off or dissipating malaria in regions where malaria abounds, the eucalyptus has obtained a considerable reputation. Expert opinions seem to be divided as to the way in which its beneficent results come about. Some think it is the result of the volatile oils which these trees give off through their leaves, acting as a neutralizing and even destructive power against the malarial matter in the atmosphere; others maintain that its beneficent results are caused by the fact of the trees being such rapid growers, and the great quantity of water they thus absorb and then give off purifies the atmosphere. Whatever may be the cause, the fact is evident that their presence in goodly numbers, planted in malarial regions, has produced most beneficent results.

The Roman Campagna especially has been greatly benefited, so much so that large portions once considered almost fatal to human life, and shunned and feared, are now the abodes of numbers of people who find, since the introduction of the eucalyptus trees, but little traces of the dreaded malaria that for ages once caused those regions to be so shunned and deserted.

In the low malarial regions around the Cape of Good Hope and in some similar unhealthful regions around Algiers and elsewhere, the same beneficent results have followed the introduction of the eucalyptus trees.

As yet no variety has been discovered that is able to withstand even a moderate frost, but the fact that millions of these trees can be raised so easily and quickly in California and Florida and perhaps in the warm places on the Gulf of Mexico, and that its timber can be so widely utilized, is a matter for congratulation to all who are interested in the conservation of our forests and also in the introduction of new varieties of trees that will add to the timber wealth of the country.

In general, eucalyptus may be successfully planted in the sections of the United States suitable for the culture of citrus fruits. They are grown in nearly all the agricultural sections of California, along the coast of southern Oregon, and to a limited extent in Arizona, New Mexico and western Texas. Several species have also been planted in Florida and along the Gulf coast. Here, however, occasional frosts have killed or severely damaged the trees, and for this reason planting has been discouraged.

The blue gum (Eucalyptus globulus) has a phenomenally rapid rate of growth. Seedlings stands will average a height growth of 50 feet in 6 years and 100 feet in 10 years. Under very favorable conditions individual trees have reached a height of 125 feet and a diameter of 36 inches in 9 years. In sprout stands growth is even more rapid; trees frequently reach 3 inches in diameter and 35 feet in height in 8 months, while in 3 years a diameter of 7 inches and a height of 70 feet are often attained. In California, under favorable conditions, trees have attained a height of 175 feet and a diameter of 5 feet in 25 years. Although sometimes irregular in form, the tree tends to develop a straight, gradually tapering, unforked stem. In plantations the trunks become rapidly cleared of branches to a considerable height, but in the open, trees branch more widely and gradually develop a short crown of massive, spreading branches.

Blue gum is practically immune from disease. Where trees are reproduced by sprouts, the old stumps frequently decay slowly at the heart, while the sprouts remained unaffected. Growing trees are not attacked by insect enemies, but felled timber lying unbarked upon the ground is subject to injury by a wood-mining insect.

Blue gum rarely suffers any breakage of the limbs by winds, and the spreading root system renders the trees very wind-firm.

Fire is the greatest source of injury to eucalyptus plantations. Both the natural characteristics of the trees and the conditions within planted groves render them peculiarly susceptible to fire injury. The large quantity of litter—dry leaves, branches and shredded bark—which accumulates beneath a stand is extremely inflammable. The bark of eucalyptus is so thin that the trees are injured even by light surface fires.

The wood of blue gum is very heavy, hard, strong and tough, but is not durable in contact with the soil. It is close-grained, and is split with difficulty after it has dried. It is less elastic than hickory, but it has been demonstrated by mechanical tests that seasoned blue gum timber is a little inferior in strength and stiffness to the best second-growth hickory. In appearance it closely resembles the wood of hickory and ash.

Blue-gum timber is utilized for a great variety of purposes in California. The wood is excellent for fuel, and in the treeless valleys has been the chief fuel supply for many years. In southern California the steady demand renders commercial planting for fuel very profitable. Eucalyptus timber has been extensively used in California for wharf piling. Blue-gum piles are in use in nearly every port on the California coast, and extended trial has shown that they resist the attacks of marine borers which destroy timber in sea water longer than other species commonly used for piling. Blue-gum timber has also been used to some extent for fence posts and telephone poles. The wood is not suitable for this purpose, however, on account of its short life in the ground. Seasoned posts last a little longer than green posts, and timber cut from the heart is more durable than sapwood.

Blue-gum timber has been used to a limited extent to determine its value for railroad ties. The results thus far obtained indicate that it compares favorably with second-grade pine-tie timber.

The lumber has been extensively used for vehicle stock and for wooden parts of agricultural implements. It is also made into insulator pins for electric wiring, and is used for furniture and cabinet work, hardwood flooring, trip-hammer beams, the levers of windlasses, and the blocking for oil and wine presses, wood paving, pulley blocks and belt wheels.

The extensive utilization of gum lumber has hitherto been prevented by the scanty supply of timber of merchantable size and by the difficulty experienced in seasoning the lumber without warping and checking. It is believed, however, that in the seasoning of gum no greater difficulties will be encountered than in seasoning of any other hardwood of similar density and strength.

A product of considerable importance derived from blue gum is the oil distilled from the leaves. Eucalyptus oil is recognized as a valuable drug and is extensively used by pharmacists and physicians.

In many valleys of California eucalyptus windbreaks are considered absolutely necessary to insure the successful production of crops. They have been most extensively used to safeguard citrus orchards from strong and destructive winds in southern California, but they are now being established also for the protection of vineyards and orchards of deciduous fruits, olives and walnuts. The blue gum excels other species for windbreak purposes on account of its height and the rapidity of its growth. The tall shafts of the trees bend before the wind and act as a cushion to deflect it upward over the orchard, whereas ordinary wind-break trees form a mere solid wall, and the wind draws downward, forming eddies near the leeward side.

Eucalyptus reproduce readily by both seeds and sprouts. The trees bear seed in abundance annually, and under favorable conditions natural reproduction is freely established. Trees also sprout vigorously from both the stump and the roots, either after cutting or in response to injury. In California commercial groves are almost invariably reproduced by sprouts.

Plantations should be started with young trees and not by direct sowing. The opinion is generally held that eucalyptus seedlings are so difficult to raise that their propagation is impracticable except for expert nurserymen. In point of fact, blue gum is one of the most easily propagated species.

LOOKING HOMEWARD

By Rev. James E. E. Sawyer
Montreal, Can.

"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v:8.

That noble spirit, Lamennais, who tasted the bitterness of exile from his native land, comforted himself by saying: "Our homeland is not here below; man vainly seeks it here; that which he takes for it is only a lodging for the night."

The abiding home of humanity is not here. We are all wanderers. Our real home is elsewhere. This is not the place of our rest. All noble souls, loftily or lowly, are travelers, walking not by sight but by faith. Our dearest treasures are laid up in heaven. Our hopes, our interests, our hearts, are there. "They that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country." "They desire a better country that is heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city."

Our adversities are the necessary incidents of a journey. All earth's joys are the shifting scenes of a land through which we are traveling. This world is the scene of vicissitudes, of storms, of sorrows, of partings, of heart-breaks and tragic loneliness. There is a peaceful and permanent home awaiting the Christian—a city that hath foundations, a settled habitation, a haven after life's tempestuous voyage, a refuge from all the sorrows of the present existence, a land of light where there is no more painful mystery, a land of love and eternal reunion, where sympathy is perfect, where the heart is satisfied, a realm secure and gladsome, thronged with ancient folk and dear ones of our own day. There we shall see as we are seen and know as we are known. There light intellectual is full-charged with love, love of true good; full-charged with gladness — gladness which transcends every sweetness. That is the goal of all our belongings. Archbishop Leighton used to say that if he were to choose a place to die in it should be an inn, for that would look so like a pilgrim's going home. God gave him his wish. In an inn he ended his pilgrimage, and went home to the city of the sun, toward which he had long looked wistfully. To the spiritually minded that homeland is more real than anything round about them here.

It is not in the darkest hours of life alone that the vision of that home is most attractive. Often the thought of its peace, its fruition, its infinite and eternal satisfaction of our desires and possibilities, comes to us with strange power when life is strongest and most joyous. In the hour of some great joy, at the time of the accomplishment of some purpose which has cost protracted and strenuous endeavor, or when we have beheld the mystic beauty of a perfect morning or have looked into eternity through the splendor of the sunset, the thought of the home of the soul has been a rapture of desire. Our best and happiest hours are prophetic of heaven, are windows through which we obtain fascinating glimpses of its ideal beauty. When, like Simeon, we hold the Light and hope of the world in our arms, like him, our heart exclaims: "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Were we to have one minute of perfect existence, bodily, mentally and spiritually, one minute of absolutely perfect health, perfect spiritual vision and harmony and happiness, the veil between us and our home would disappear. Without dying we would arrive instantly at home.

The longing for home is not the weariness of weaklings, the ennui of worldlings, the indolence of the ease-loving, the cynicism and disgust of those who do not find this life worth living. It is characteristic of fulness of spiritual life and energy. None have more earnestly longed for heaven than the bravest soldiers of the cross, and heroes of the faith. Paul, though for the sake of others willing to remain in the flesh, confessed to a desire to depart. It was because to live was Christ that to die would be gain. He said: "For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but that we would be clothed upon, that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life. . . . Being, therefore, always of good courage, and knowing that whilst we are at home in the body we are absent from the Lord—for we walk by faith, not by sight—we are of good courage, I say, and are willing rather to be absent from the body and to be at home with the Lord." He was so fully alive that he longed for the land of the living.

In his later years, though he was not really aged, and was surrounded by a beloved and happy family, Luther longed to be with Christ and behold his glory. He toiled tremendously and with unabated heroic energy till within a few days of his death; but he had often expressed his desire for release. Nearly five years before his decease, on his recovery from a painful and dangerous illness, he wrote to his prince, who had sent his private physician to attend him: "I should have been well content if the dear Lord Jesus had taken me in his mercy from hence, as I am now of little use on the earth." It is the greatness of man, not his littleness, that inspires him with desire for larger room and the fulfilment of his noblest desires and holiest ideals.

THE REPUBLICAN,
Oakland, Md.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 18, 1910.

FOR CONGRESS.

To the voters of the 6th Congressional District:

I desire to announce my candidacy for the Republican nomination for Congress at the forthcoming primaries, which will be held on August 30th. I will appreciate the active support of all Republicans.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR.,
Kensington, Md.

I hereby announce my candidacy for Congress from the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, subject to the decision of the Republican primaries to be held on August 30th.

ALEXANDER R. HAGNER,
Hagerstown.

VOTE FOR HAGNER.

The withdrawal of Col. George A. Pearre from the Congressional race leaves three candidates, Messrs. Hagner, Blair and Warner, from among whom the Republican voters of the Sixth District are to select their candidate to be voted for in November next.

It seems to us, from the Garrett county viewpoint, that Mr. Hagner should be the choice of the party in this county.

It is undeniably certain that Mr. Hagner is a bona fide resident of the Sixth District, his home being located near its geographical center, and therefore no question can be raised as to the legal status of his citizenship; he is a Republican of a lifetime's duration, his ancestors being among the party's founders; he is thoroughly identified with the material welfare and development of every industrial, economic and progressive interest in the District; he is active, energetic, capable and untiring in his industry, and will make a model representative; he has already announced through these columns and elsewhere his determination to get behind and push to a successful conclusion the project of rebuilding the old National Road under government supervision and control, and this plank in his platform alone should win him hundreds of votes in Garrett and throughout the whole District.

Let us support Alexander R. Hagner enthusiastically; let the free and untrammelled Republican electorate of Garrett county rally to the suppopt of this man who can be approached as a friend by every citizen, from the highest to the lowest, and feel that his rights and interests will be carefully and honestly looked after and fully and impartially protected.

Vote for Alexander R. Hagner at the primaries of the 30th of August, and we confidently predict that no Republican in Garrett County will ever have cause to regret having done so.

COL. PEARRE'S WITHDRAWAL.

Col. Pearre's announcement of his withdrawal from the contest for the nomination for Congress will be a great surprise to the Republicans of the Sixth district and the entire state. The Colonel has rendered good service in the interests of the state and his constituents during his twelve years as a member of the House of Representatives.

In defining his reason for his retirement from active politics he says that during his fifteen years of political activity and service to his party and the people he has been compelled to neglect personal affairs and now finds that it is imperative that he should give them more care than the unremitting devotion which he has given to the public interests ever since he has been in public office would permit.

The withdrawal of Colonel Pearre leaves the contest for the nomination to Gist Blair, Alexander R. Hagner and B. H. Warner, Jr. The nominee of the party will surely receive the loyal support of every Republican in the district and the old Sixth, the Gibraltar of Republicanism in Maryland, can be depended upon to return a Republican successor to Colonel Pearre in the House of Representatives.—Baltimore American.

THEY ALL KEEP BUSY.

The dog days would be a little duller, the humidity would be more depressing and the daily grind more nerve wearing were it not for the uplift and mental refreshment that is to be derived from the stories which daily find their way into print about the doing of hens, cows, bugs, snakes and various other representatives of the beast, bird, insect or reptilian kingdom. For instance, an authenticated (always authenticated) story from the Altoona region of Pennsylvania tells of a hen that lays a poached egg three afternoons of every week. On the same day that the foregoing story came out, a sturgeon 6 feet 8 inches long attacked the occupants of of a rowboat on the Niagara River—jumped in the boat and came near putting a young lady overboard. It is pleasant to know that the sturgeon lost in the final round and furnised steaks for the winners. And again, on that eventful day, a cow-sucker snake of enormous proportions made war on a New Jersey farmer. Again the human contestant won at the finish, though in the early stage of the combat the snake, by wrapping himself around the farmer's legs, seemed to have the fight well in hand

In Louisville, Ky., the other day, a mule caused a run upon a bank. He accomplished the trick in this way—he got himself sold for $75, was paid for by a check and then promptly laid down and died. The man who had given the check stopped payment and when the bank refused to hand over the money upon presentation of the check, the rumor was spread that the institution was busted and the run began. A common yellow dog on last Thursday guided a Newark policeman to a lost two-year-old child and then showed the officer the way to the child's home. But the stories are infinite in variety and each batch sheds light on the intellectual perversities, moral or social attributes or the belligerent propensities of some member of what is sometimes broadly classified as the animal kingdom.

GIST BLAIR,

Of Montgomery County,

Announces Platform and Makes Statement to the Republican Voters of the Sixth Congressional District.

If allowed to represent this district for the next two years, I propose to be your Congressman twelve months out of each year. When I am not at work in Washington, I'll be at work somewhere else. I shall have but one single interest and that interest shall be the Sixth Maryland District.

Not only will I cast my vote in Congress for the things you stand for but I shall devote my time and my labor to the material benefit and general uplift of my constituents. I shall help you to bring more people here; help your towns locate more factories; help you to impress investors with your splendid advantages; help you in in obtaining better railroad facilities, better banking facilities and better mail facilities.

In addition to being your mouthpiece in the halls of Congress and your advocate before the federal departments at Washington, I propose to be your business agent whenever and wherever I can serve you. I want to help exploit our district's resources, help secure better markets for the things we make and grow, and help you make and grow more of those products which will bring greater wealth to our people.

I have no higher ambition than to work for your welfare. The little needs of my district, if I am elected, shall receive my attention as readily as the big needs of the Republic, if not a little more so. I know of nothing that adds a dollar of wealth to Western Maryland too small to merit my attention. And I entertain no ideas of statesmanship so exalted that they forbid such services on the part of a Congressman.

Congress owes us consideration. Every important town in the Sixth District should have a postoffice building. I shall work for them. The National Road from Baltimore to Springfield should be built. I shall work for it. The government should erect a fuel testing plant in Western Maryland. I shall insist upon that. The Department of Agriculture should experiment with our soils. I shall demand that.

I am a Republican by training and conviction. I shall subscribe to my party's program but shall urge that that program be progressive.

My campaign has been a clean campaign and it shall be clean throughout. I shall indulge in no personalities and shall discourage all factional bitterness. I want your support, not because you may dislike any of my opponents, but because you may believe in the things I believe in. I want you to support me because you believe that I believe the things I say.

HOYES.

We are having very warm and extremely dry weather. It seems that the much needed rains have missed us for some time.

Miss Lina Callis returned last week from a two weeks' visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Deal, at Hazelton, West Va.

Miss Florence Custer, Miss Poe and Lloyd Custer, all of Grafton, arrived in Hoyes on Monday and are guests at Arthur Custer's.

Miss Sudie Friend is visiting relatives in Mountain Lake and Oakland.

Rev. Powers, pastor of the M. E. church, delivered a very interesting sermon to us on Sunday.

Mr. Charles DeWitt and family spent Sunday afternoon with Walter Coddington and family.

Robert L. Fries, County Treasurer, was calling upon us Monday for our taxes.

Miss Auburn Smith has been visiting relatives at Mt. Lake, Oakland and Armstead for the past two weeks.

Miss Bertha Dewitt returned home Tuesday after spending a week at Chautauqua at Mt. Lake Park and visiting relatives.

Miss Nita Blackburn, of Keyser, is a guest of her uncle and aunt, Rev. and Mrs. H. E. Friend.

Mrs. Miller and son, of Johnstown, Pa., are spending a week with their cousins, John Callis and family.

Miss Kate O'Donnell, of Loch Lynne, was a guest of Misses Ollie and Bernadette Mattingly for a few days last week.

Willie Bishoff, railroad postal clerk, spent a few days last week in our town.

Mr. Isaiah Friend, an aged gentleman of Elder, is visiting his daughter, Mrs. D. O. Dewitt.

Miss Collier Thayer, of Crellin, returned to her home last Saturday after spending some time with relatives at this place.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Lowdermilk and baby were visiting Mrs. Lowdermilk's parents, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Dewitt, Sunday.

Commissioner Lowdermilk, of Selbysport, dined with W. A. Smith and family last Sunday.

Mr. C. C. Pattison's store was struck by lightning on last Wednesday evening. The night was calm and delightful, no thunder accompanied, no rain followed and no damage was sustained. The old terror that splits the clouds and rattles the furniture of the heavens, when he is turned loose by the elements, in this case was harnessed, bridled and checked by the usual mechanical means that make it as humble as a tallow candle, only a hundred times more brilliant. The electric line for the transmission of illuminating power, which has been promised the people for months and months, is no longer a promise but a real live thing, and was completed as far as Pattison's store, the first building to be wired, on Tuesday and the lights turned on in the building the following evening. The work will continue and poles will be erected throughout the town to give the residents an opportunity to avail themselves of this convenience.—Bloomington Corr. Piedmont Independent.

In order that its locomotive engineers may maintain a uniform rate of speed and operate their trains with the greatest possible comfort to the traveling public, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is installing speed recorders in passenger engines used on through trains. The dial of these speed recorders is placed in the engineer's side of the cab, in plain view of the man who operates the throttle, and indicates to him the speed of the train at all times. In addition to imparting this information, the recorder registers on a paper chart the speed at which a train is operated at every point on a division, and, upon the arrival at terminals, the chart is replaced and sent to the Division Superintendent so that he has before him a daily record of the speed at which trains are operated in his territory. The work of equipping the engines with speed recorders has been begun, under the supervision of Mr. J. D. Harris, general superintendent of motive power of the Baltimore and Ohio, and will be completed as quickly as possible.

McHENRY.

Mrs. Howard Brenneman is on the sick list at this writing but we are glad to say she is much improved.

Mr. George Glotfelty and family took dinner with Jonas Glotfelty on Friday.

Quite a large crowd attended church services at McHenry Sunday, the sermon and singing being unusually good.

Misses Esther and Elinor Hinebaugh entertained at dinner last week.

Mr. O'Kelly and son, Dr. White and Mr. Kittle have returned to their homes in Morgantown, W. Va. TRIPLETS.

DEER PARK.

One of the events of the week, and a very pleasing one, at the Deer Park Hotel was a complimentary musical arranged by Mr. Dunham, leader of the orchestra. It was given in the ballroom. Mrs. Gordon P. Paine, Miss Olivia Turnbull, of Baltimore, and Mrs. Marshall Bell, of Pittsburg, a former Baltimorean, were among the patronesses.

A vaudeville entertainment is in rehearsal for an evening this week. There is something going on all the time. Bridge parties in the cottage colony, and dancing in the ballroom keep the visitor from anything approaching lassitude or mental depression. Everyone has a good time. The nights are deliciously cool for sleeping, and, indeed, throughout the day there is a very pleasant mountain breeze prevailing.

After the vaudeville diversion will come the annual barn dance, always a great feature at the Deer Park Hotel, and the promoters are busily engaged preparing novel designs calculated to portray agricultural scenes in the decoration of the ballroom.

Saturday, Mrs. Gordon Paine, of Baltimore, gave a picnic at Boiling Spring in honor of Miss Louise Warfield, daughter of the former governor. Visconde de Alte, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Portugal; Mrs. DeFord, the Misses DeFord and Mr. Charles Morris Howard, of Baltimore, were in the party, and all had a merry time. A pretty drive brings one to the spring, but some of the guests walked over. Luncheon was spread on the rocks and was such a novelty and so pleasant that a general disinclination to return prevailed. Mrs. Paine went to Baltimore on Wednesday for a day's shopping, returning Thursday night.

Miss Warfield is receiving much attention. She is a very lovely girl and is much admired. Ex-Governor Warfield may come up later. He is very fond of Deer Park.

Another social event was a dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. Paine in honor of Miss Warfield. The rooms of Mrs. Paine's cottage were prettily decorated by Weber, the Oakland florist, and the scene was a brilliant one. Dr. and Mrs. John K. Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Josias Pennington, Mrs. Charles Morris Howard, Mr. Alexander Preston, Miss Turnbull and Mrs. A. Marshall Bell were among the guests.

Mrs. Edward Shoemaker and her sister, Miss Anne Turnbull, daughters of Mrs. A. Nisbet Turnbull, of Red House cottage, are now in Switzerland. They will return to the States in October, too late, however, to enjoy the closing September scenes of the Deer Park Hotel season. The hotel remains open until September 30th.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Maddy, of New York, were here for a day or two last week. They formerly resided in Baltimore. Mr. Maddy being in charge of the publicity department of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He is now connected with the Erie Railroad Company and resides in New York. They came to Deer Park in their private car, and were guests at Uplands.

Mrs. Willard F. Warner, Mrs. R. M. Cousar, Miss Meacham and Mr. Frederick Truesdell, all of Washington, D. C., are visiting Colonel and Mrs. Geo. Truesdell, at Truesdell Heights.

Miss Irene Haulenbeek is entertaining Miss Margaret Milbourne, of 2339 North Calvert street, Baltimore, at her summer home, Uplands. Miss Milbourne is full of praise for Garrett county and its delightful, health giving climate.

Mrs. J. Sewell Thomas, of 2715 St. Paul street, Baltimore, came to Deer Park Sunday to spend the remainder of the summer at Uplands.

Colonel Truesdell has received an order from South Africa for a yearling Rambouillet ram. A check for $400 accompanied the order. This should be a feather in the cap of Maryland sheep raisers.

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. Unseemly noises disturbed her during the night. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff-button in a hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff-button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson arrived. Gertrude revealed she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. Gertrude was suspected. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff-button. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey left in response to a telegram. Gertrude said she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him a loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong wrecked his own bank and could clear Bailey. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, was found at the lodge. The lodgekeeper said Louise and Arnold had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated. Louise told Halsey that while she still loved him she was to marry another, and that he would despise her when he learned the whole story.

CHAPTER XIV.—Continued.

Gertrude and Halsey went for a long walk that afternoon and Louise slept. Time hung heavy on my hands, and I did as I had fallen into a habit of doing lately—I sat down and thought things over. One result of my meditations was that I got up suddenly and went to the telephone. I had taken the most intense dislike to this Dr. Walker, whom I had never seen, and who was being talked of in the countryside as the fiance of Louise Armstrong.

I knew Sam Huston well. There had been a time, when Sam was a good deal younger than he is now, before he had married Anne Endicott, when I knew him even better. So now I felt no hesitation in calling him over the telephone. But when his office boy had given way to his confidential clerk, and that functionary had condescended to connect his employer's desk telephone, I was somewhat at a loss as to how to begin.

"Why, how are you, Rachel?" Sam said sonorously. "Going to build that house at Rock View?" It was a 20-year-old joke of his.

"Sometime, perhaps," I said. "Just now I want to ask you a question about something which is none of my business."

"I see you haven't changed an iota in a quarter of a century, Rachel." This was intended to be another jest. "Ask ahead; everything but my domestic affairs is at your service."

"Try to be serious," I said. "And tell me this: Has your firm made any plans for a house recently for a Dr. Walker at Casanova?"

"Yes, we have."

"Where was it to be built? I have a reason for asking."

"It was to be, I believe, on the Armstrong place. Mr. Armstrong himself consulted me, and the inference was—in fact, I am quite certain—the house was to be occupied by Mr. Armstrong's daughter, who was engaged to marry Dr. Walker."

When the architect had inquired for the different members of my family, and had finally rung off, I was certain of one thing. Louise Armstrong was in love with Halsey, and the man she was going to marry was Dr. Walker. Moreover, this decision was not new; marriage had been contemplated for some time. There must certainly be some explanation—but what was it?

That day I repeated to Louise the telegram Mr. Harton had opened. She seemed to understand, but an unhappier face I have never seen. She looked like a criminal whose reprieve is over, and the day of execution approaching.

CHAPTER XV.

Liddy Gives the Alarm.

The next day, Friday, Gertrude broke the news of her stepfather's death to Louise. She did it as gently as she could, telling her first that he was very ill, and finally that he was dead. Louise received the news in the most unexpected manner, and when Gertrude came out to tell me how she had stood it, I think she was almost shocked.

"She just lay and stared at me, Aunt Ray," she said. "Do you know, I believe she is glad, glad! And she is too honest to pretend anything else. What sort of a man was Mr. Paul Armstrong, anyhow?"

"He was a bully as well as a rascal, Gertrude," I said. "But I am convinced of one thing: Louise will send for Halsey now, and they will make it all up."

For Louise had steadily refused to see Halsey all that day, and the boy was frantic.

We had a quiet hour, Halsey and I, that evening, and I told him several things; about the request that we give up the lease to Sunnyside, about the telegram to Louise, about the rumors of the approaching marriage between [illegible] and Dr. Walker, and, last of [illegible] interview with her the [illegible]

[illegible] sentiment o[illegible] air, with his [illegible]te from any [illegible] est, but fr[illegible] face in the shadow, and my heart fairly ached for him. He was so big and boyish! When I had finished he drew a long breath.

"Whatever Louise does," he said, "nothing will convince me, Aunt Ray, that she doesn't care for me. And up to two months ago, when she and her mother went west, I was the happiest fellow on earth. Then something made a difference; she wrote me that her people were opposed to the marriage; that her feeling for me was what it had always been, but that something had happened which had changed her ideas as to the future. I was not to write until she wrote me, and whatever occurred, I was to think the best I could of her. It sounded like a puzzle. When I saw her yesterday, it was the same thing, only, perhaps, worse."

"Halsey," I asked, "have you any idea of the nature of the interview between Louise Armstrong and Arnold the night he was murdered?"

"It was stormy. Thomas says once or twice he almost broke into the room, he was so alarmed for Louise."

"Another thing, Halsey," I said, "have you ever heard Louise mention a woman named Carrington, Nina Carrington?"

"Never," he said positively.

For try as we would, our thoughts always came back to that fatal Saturday night, and the murder. Every conversational path led to it, and we all felt that Jamieson was tightening the threads of evidence around John Bailey. The detective's absence was hardly reassuring; he must have had something to work on in town or he would have returned.

"We Had a Quiet Hour," Halsey and I.

The papers reported that the cashier of the Traders' bank was ill in his apartments at the Knickerbocker—a condition not surprising, considering everything. The guilt of the defunct president was no longer in doubt; the missing bonds had been advertised and some of them discovered. In every instance they had been used as collateral for large loans, and the belief was current that not less than a million and a half dollars had been realized. Every one connected with the bank had been placed under arrest, and released on heavy bond.

Was he alone in his guilt, or was the cashier his accomplice? Where was the money? The estate of the dead man was comparatively small—a city house on a fashionable street, Sunnyside, a large estate largely mortgaged, an insurance of $50,000, and some personal property—this was all. The rest lost in speculation probably, the papers said. There was one thing which looked uncomfortable for Jack Bailey: He and Paul Armstrong together had promoted a railroad company in New Mexico, and it was rumored that together they had sunk large sums of money there. The business alliance between the two men added to the belief that Bailey knew something of the looting. His unexplained absence from the bank on Monday lent color to the suspicion against him. The strange thing seemed to be his surrendering himself on the point of departure. To me, it seemed the shrewd calculation of a clever rascal. I was not actively antagonistic to Gertrude's lover, but I meant to be convinced, one way or the other. I took no one on faith.

That night the Sunnyside ghost began to walk again. Liddy had been sleeping in Louise's dressing room on a couch, and the approach of dusk was a signal for her to barricade the entire suite. Situated as it was, beyond the circular staircase, nothing but an extremity of excitement would have made her pass it after dark. I confess myself that the place seemed to me to have a sinister appearance, but we kept that wing well lighted, and until the lights went out at midnight it was really cheerful, if one did not know its history.

On Friday night, then, I had gone to bed, resolved to go at once to sleep. Thoughts that insisted on obtruding themselves I pushed resolutely to the back of my mind, and I systematically relaxed every muscle. I fell asleep soon, and was dreaming that Dr. Walker was building his new house immediately in front of my windows; I could hear the thump-thump of the hammers, and then I waked to a knowledge that somebody was pounding on my door.

I was up at once, and with the sound of my footstep on the floor the low knocking ceased, to be followed immediately by sibilant whispering through the keyhole.

"Miss Rachel! Miss Rachel!" somebody was saying, over and over.

"Is that you, Liddy?" I asked, my hand on the knob.

"For the love of mercy, let me in!" she said in a low tone.

She was leaning against the door, for when I opened it, she fell in. She was greenish-white, and she had a red and black barred flannel petticoat over her shoulders.

"Listen," she said, standing in the middle of the floor and holding on to me. "Oh, Miss Rachel, it's the ghost of that dead man hammering to get in!"

Sure enough, there was a dull thud—thud—thud—it came apparently from the wall.

"It's not a ghost," I said decidedly. "If it was a ghost it wouldn't rap; it would come through the keyhole." Liddy looked at the keyhole. "But it sounds very much as though some one is trying to break into the house."

Liddy was shivering violently. I told her to get me my slippers and she brought me a pair of kid gloves, so I found my things myself and prepared to call Halsey. As before, the night alarm had found the electric lights gone; the hall, save for its night lamp, was in darkness, as I went across to Halsey's room. I hardly know what I feared, but it was a relief to find him there, very sound asleep, and with his door unlocked.

"Wake up, Halsey," I said, shaking him.

He stirred a little. Liddy was half in and half out of the door, afraid as usual to be left alone, and not quite daring to enter. Her scruples seemed to fade, however, all at once. She gave a suppressed yell, bolted into the room and stood tightly clutching the foot-board of the bed. Halsey was gradually waking.

"I've seen it," Liddy wailed. "A woman in white down the hall!"

I paid no attention.

"Halsey," I persevered, "some one is breaking into the house. Get up, won't you?"

"It isn't our house," he said sleepily. And then he roused to the exigency of the occasion. "All right, Aunt Ray," he said, still yawning. "If you'll let me get into something—"

It was all I could do to get Liddy out of the room. The demands of the occasion had no influence on her; she had seen the ghost, she persisted, and she wasn't going into the hall. But I got her over to my room at last, more dead than alive, and made her lie down on the bed.

The tappings, which seemed to have ceased for a while, had commenced again, but they were fainter. Halsey came over in a few minutes, and stood listening and trying to locate the sound.

"Give me my revolver, Aunt Ray," he said; and I got it—the one I had found in the tulip bed—and gave it to him. He saw Liddy there and divined at once that Louise was alone.

"You let me attend to this fellow, whoever it is, Aunt Ray, and go to Louise, will you? She may be awake and alarmed."

So in spite of her protests, I left Liddy alone and went back to the east wing. Perhaps I went a little faster past the yawning blackness of the circular staircase; and I could hear Halsey creaking cautiously down the main staircase. The rapping, or pounding, had ceased, and the silence was almost painful. And then suddenly, from apparently under my very feet, there rose a woman's scream, a cry of terror that broke off as suddenly as it came. I stood frozen and still. Every drop of blood in my body seemed to leave the surface and gather around my heart. In the dead silence that followed it throbbed as if it would burst. More dead than alive, I stumbled into Louise's bedroom. She was not there!

CHAPTER XVI.

In the Early Morning.

I stood looking at the empty bed. The coverings had been thrown back, and Louise's pink silk dressing-gown was gone from the foot, where it had lain. The night lamp burned dimly, revealing the emptiness of the place. I picked it up, but my hand shook so that I put it down again, and got somehow to the door.

There were voices in the hall and Gertrude came running toward me.

"What is it?" she cried. "What was that sound? Where is Louise?"

"She is not in her room," I said stupidly. "I think—it was she—who screamed."

Liddy had joined us now, carrying a light. We stood huddled together at the head of the circular staircase, looking down into its shadows. There was nothing to be seen, and it was absolutely quiet down there. Then we heard Halsey running up the main staircase. He came quickly down the hall to where we were standing.

"There's no one trying to get in. I thought I heard some one shriek. Who was it?"

Our stricken faces told him the truth.

"Some one screamed down there," I said. "And—and Louise is not in her room."

With a jerk Halsey took the light from Liddy and ran down the circular staircase. I followed him, more slowly. My nerves seemed to be in a state of paralysis; I could scarcely step. At the foot of the stairs Halsey gave an exclamation and put down the light.

"Aunt Ray," he called sharply.

At the foot of the staircase, huddled in a heap, her head on the lower stair, was Louise Armstrong. She lay limp and white, her dressing-gown dragging loose from one sleeve of her night-dress, and the heavy braid of her dark hair stretching its length a couple of steps above her head, as if she had slipped down.

She was not dead; Halsey put her down on the floor and began to rub her cold hands, while Gertrude and Liddy ran for stimulants. As for me, I sat there at the foot of that ghostly staircase—sat, because my knees wouldn't hold me—and wondered where it would all end. Louise was still unconscious, but she was breathing better, and I suggested that we get her back to bed before she came to. There was something grisly and horrible to me, seeing her there in almost the same attitude and in the same place where we had found her brother's body. And to add to the similarity, just then the hall clock, far off, struck faintly three o'clock.

It was four before Louise was able to talk, and the first rays of dawn were coming through her windows, which faced the east, before she could tell us coherently what had occurred. I give it as she told it. She lay propped in bed, and Halsey sat beside her, unrebuffed, and held her hand while she talked.

She Lay Limp and White.

"Why did Washington cross the Delaware?"

Why, indeed? Not a child could think of anything but the answer to the famous chicken problem: "To get on the other side," and, of course, that wouldn't do. Then little Annie's hand shot into the air. Little Annie crosses the Delaware every summer herself, hence the bright idea.

She Burned the House.

A woman in Montana sat down the other day and thought about house cleaning—about the carpets and rugs to clean, the woodwork to wash, the bedding to wash, the curtains to wash, the portieres to wash, the stairways and the railings and the floors and the steps and the windows and everything else to be washed and cleaned—and she got so worried over the prospect that she set fire to the house. Do you blame her? If she had only known as you do that Easy Task soap will do half the work of washing and cleaning, she would have felt more cheerful. It's a nickel a cake and one woman said she would pay a dollar a cake for it if she could get it no other way.

VEILS FOR SUMMER

By JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

The veil for summer is the airiest of creations, falling about the brim of hats and over faces and floating free to the summer winds. Dots, set on, have been shown less favor than lace patterns on a net ground or large meshed nets with figures woven in.

Those veils which are not of the floating kind are of the latter variety and are worn with wide-brimmed hats and drawn to the back and under the collar. It requires some care to pin and adjust them correctly, and getting under them is a matter that consumes time. They are very neat in appearance, however, and very becoming. Hence their wearers are willing to put in the necessary time to adjust and readjust them.

The lace veils show light pattern having a scroll border and butterflies, birds or even tiny chanticlers woven in. The heavy figures proved too unbecoming to meet with anything like general favor. They were, in fact, disfiguring. Black chantilly and white wash nets with scroll borders are the most popular of floating veils, and fancy large-meshed nets hold first place in the others.

The net veils just described have been adopted for mourning wear as cooler than the usual mourning fabrics, for those people who must be out a great deal. They are bordered with bands of crape or with siuk grenadine or other mourning fabric. Rows of grosgrain ribbon, graduated in width or otherwise, are also used as a border finish. Veils of this kind hang straight from the hat brim and reach below the bust line.

A wide-brimmed sailor for general wear, trimmed with a band and adorned with a white net veil is about as satisfactory as any hat can be.

PARISIAN MODEL

This model is of batiste made with tucks and finished in front with a band of embroidery and a plaited frill of the batiste.

The epaulets and deep cuffs are also tucked and the rather full sleeves are encircled with bands of the embroidery.

Needlework for Gifts.

Pretty work to keep on hand for summer and to get ready for the next gift occasion is the shirtwaist frill of sheer handkerchief linen and its buttons made to match.

The scalloped edge of a graduated strip for the frill is done in china-blue embroidery cotton and a set of six buttons for the front box plait of the shirtwaist completes the gift.

Cover button molds with china-blue linen worked with white cotton. These two, mounted upon tissue paper (after the frill is pressed into plaits) and boxed, make a most attractive little gift and represent hours well spent.

Red Leather Belts.

A pretty and odd finish is given to the belt of many a Russian blouse by a touch of red leather. Sometimes it is just an oblong piece of leather sewed on the belt, at the back where the blouse is fastened to coat. Sometimes patches of leather are sewed on the front where the belt fastens. While these may be used on a coat of any color with which red may be combined, it is particularly effective on blouses of black and white shepherd's checks.

BLOUSES THAT ARE POPULAR

Very Attractive and Becoming Designs Are Being Introduced This Season.

Overblouse effects are extremely popular this summer, and some very attractive and becoming designs of this order are being introduced. The waist may, of course, be worn with any preferred skirt of harmonizing design, either attached in semi-princess style or adjusted separately.

A French lining forms the basis of many of the waists, serving as a foundation for the underbody, which will prove the most effective if made of allover lace, net or tucking, the standing color being of the same material. The waist proper is tucked from both shoulder seams in front and back, the front tucks terminating either at bust depth or at the waistline as preferred. At the neck edge it is cut in circular fashion, with a deeply pointed opening at the center front.

The sleeve caps may be made with or without an opening to correspond. Two sleeve models are given for the underbody. The one-seam fitted sleeves may be made in full or shorter length while the puff sleeves are in elbow length only.

The present season is very prolific in pretty fabrics that would be entirely appropriate for the purpose. Silk, cashmere, albatross, messaline, shantung, foulard and chiffon pongee are advantageously used.

Hats for Young Girls.

Many flounced hats are being worn by young girls, the materials being lace or plaited chiffon over lace. The forms these hats take are extremely diversified, some of them being tall, inverted pot shapes, with seven or eight inch lace flounces draped from the top of the high crown and falling an inch or more below the brim all round. Festoons of baby rosebuds not larger in diameter than half an inch are used around the tops of the crowns of such lace hats; or a single tinted gardenia with foliage is placed at the left side of the front.—Harper's Bazar.

Tip on Scalp Massage.

A skillful doctor of the scalp says she gets best results for the hair by working freely on the muscles that run down the neck at each side just under the ears. These connect closely with the blood vessels in the scalp and blood is forced up into healthy life.

When electricity is used women who can stand little of it on the head can have it applied through tips of fingers on these neck muscles.

WORK HORSES SHOULD RECEIVE GOOD TREATMENT

Keep Them in Condition By Feeding Grain. Work Early in Morning and Late at Night, With Long Rest at Noon.

When the Day's Work Is Ended.

Work horses should be grain fed; a horse cannot work and keep in condition on grass alone. An average sized horse at hard work will require about 16 pounds of good mixed hay, 10 pounds of cracked corn and oats and 4 pounds of wheat bran per day. A bushel of fine-cut hay weighs about 8 pounds, and corn chops about 45 pounds to the bushel. One-half peck of corn chops and one quart of wheat bran, mixed with one bushel of cut hay, adding just enough water to make the meal stick to the hay, makes a good meal for the horse. Give this ration three times a day, with a little long hay at night. If you have a pasture close to the stables, turn the animal out at night, after the mixed feed is eaten.

Work early in the morning and late in the evening and give a long rest during the hottest part of the day. This is best for man and horse. Rest and water the teams between meals. Water that has been exposed to the sun for an hour or two is better for the horse than cold well water. Mix one quart of wheat bran in each bucket of water. Let the horse rest and cool off before watering. One gallon may be given to each one at one time. Have fly nets—a guano sack cut open may be used in place of a leather net to keep off flies. Have strong but light harness. Keep the collars clean, wash the shoulders off with cold water when brought in, and rub dry. For chafed shoulders dust with powdered air-slacked lime or dress with crude petroleum. Keep the stables clean. Open windows and doors for the air to circulate. This is necessary for the health of the horse. Be careful with the teams when labor is heavy and the day hot. If a horse commences to flag and show signs of exhaustion, he should be rested at once, removed to a shady spot, his mouth and nose sponged with cold water, and allowed to rest for an hour or so. Many a valuable animal is permanently injured through pure carelessness on the part of the driver. In harvesting, have the work well planned out; let each man have his part to do. Keep steady at it, with no rushing. More can be done and that without injury to either man or horse.

TO INCREASE FARM CROPS

All Progressive Agriculturists Interested in Question of How to Make Lands Yield More.

All progressive agriculturists are deeply interested in the question of how to increase the yield per acre in the cultivated sections of the United States.

It is well known that the European grows larger crops per acre than are grown in this country, and, as the price of farm land is increasing and there is a demand for larger crops each year, it is necessary to study and learn how the output of the soil can be made to meet the increased demand for all farm products.

The average yield of wheat per acre for 1909 was: England, 34.4; France, 22; Belgium, 39.2; Germany, 30.4; United States, 15.7.

"Von Seelhorst," Royal Agricultural Experiment Station, Gottingen, Germany, says:

"I believe that the principal increase of the harvest is to be attributed in part to the application of artificial fertilizers themselves and in part to their combination with green manures. Through the application of the two the yield upon the average has been doubled on our common light soils. In some cases the yield has even been increased two and one-half to threefold.

"The greatly increased yields which we are now producing in Germany, especially of wheat, are dependent upon improved seed, larger and more intelligent use of fertilizers, especially of artificial fertilizers, better crop rotation and more thorough tillage. Of these factors, however, the use of fertilizers takes first rank very decidedly in increasing the crop yields."

"I can only say that the largest proportion of the increase of different crops in the Netherlands I would attribute to the proper use of commercial fertilizers and to the use of improved varieties of seed, the other factors, rotation and proper tillage, coming in the second place."—The Director General of Agriculture, The Hague, Holland.

President Creelman, Ontario Agricultural College, says:

"Italy has been practising the art of agriculture since the early days of old civilization, hundreds of years before the Christian era began, and agriculture is still the most important industry in Italy, as 85 per cent. of the soil is productive.

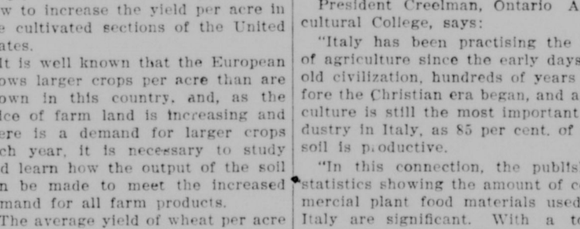
"In this connection, the published statistics showing the amount of commercial plant food materials used in Italy are significant. With a total area of less than 115,000 square miles (about twice the area of Illinois), Italy used 1,147,700 tons of commercial fertilizers in 1907."

"The great factor has been the introduction of fertilizers and purchased feeding stuffs. As soon as you can introduce on a farm some extraneous source of fertility you can raise the standard of production."—A. D. Hall, Rothamsted Experiment Station, Harpenden, England.

Saddle Grafting.

Saddle grafting is used for small plants, the stock being cut to a wedge and the scions cut and set upon the wedge. In splice grafting of the simplest form the two parts are cut across diagonally and laid together, being tied together with a string and waxed. It is useful for soft or tender wood which will not admit of splitting.

GENERAL PURPOSE STABLE



The accompanying illustration shows the elevation and floor plan of one of the barns on the farm of the Wisconsin agricultural college at Madison. It was designed for a general purpose barn and as will be seen it is very conveniently arranged. It might be said that there is too much room taken up by the driveways, but they make the interior accessible to wagons and manure spreaders and prove most convenient. Very desirable features are the five room box-stalls, feed and harness rooms and interior water trough.

In stormy weather the stock can be easily and comfortably cared for in such a barn. Windows are plenty and of sufficient size to permit a free entrance of sunlight. The walls are high and allow a large place on the second floor for the storage of hay, fodder and grain.

Altogether, this plan is an admirable one for the general farmer.

Silage Experiment.

Twenty-three acres of corn after rye, planted June 1, last year, with cowpeas drilled between rows at the first cultivation, produced at the New Jersey Experiment station 214.8 tons of silage. The total cost was $3.51 per ton in the silo.

A BAD THING TO NEGLECT.

Don't neglect the kidneys when you notice lack of control over the secretions. Passages become too frequent or scanty; urine is discolored and sediment appears. No medicine for such troubles like Doan's Kidney Pills. They quickly remove kidney disorders.

A. Dashem, 241 N. Grant St., Wooster, O., says: "The doctors diagnosed my case as gravel, but my agony increased under their treatment, and I soon became too weak to stand alone. I had given up all hope of living more than a few weeks at the best. I was strongly urged to try Doan's Kidney Pills, and after twelve days' use, I passed two gravel stones. After that, I improved rapidly until cured."

Remember the name—Doan's.

It Wouldn't Stretch.

The assessor was doing the very best he could, but the farmer was shrewd and wary.

"How many acres of farming land have you?" he inquired warily.

"'Bout 20, I guess," said Reuben.

"Twenty! Why, it looks to me like nearer 120. Come, now, can't you increase that a little? There are surely more than 20 acres in that tract. Suppose you stretch that a little."

"Say, feller," said the farmer, "this ain't no rubber plantation."—Harper's Monthly.

Don't Eat Soap.

Every now and then you get a faint taste of soap in something you eat. That is because the pot or skillet or saucepan has been cleaned (?) with ordinary yellow soap, and it has left a trace of the rancid fat and nauseating rosin in the vessel. If Easy Task soap is used, the cooking utensils are made absolutely clean and antiseptically sterilized. Families that use Easy Task soap seldom have a doctor's bill to pay, because it drives out disease germs with the dirt. One cake of it is worth two of other sorts.

What They Did With Them.

An American who spends much of his time in England tells of a cockney who went to a dealer in dogs and thus described what he wanted. "Hi wants a kind of dog about so 'igh an' so long. Hit's a kind of gr'y'ound, an' yet it ain't a gr'y'ound, because 'is tyle is shorter nor any o' these 'ere gr'y'ounds, an' 'is nose is shorter, an' 'e ain't so slim round the body. But still 'e's a kind o' gr'y'hound. Do you keep such dogs?" "We do not," said the dog man. "We drown 'em."

The Motive Power.

"A western editor says nobody was ever hurt while taking a 'joy ride' on the handles of a plow."

"That's where he's mistaken. Many a good man has been kicked by a mule."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Different Values.

"There's a big difference in men."

"I judge so, by studying the various rates for which Pittsburg councilmen were bought."

THE BEST OF ITS KIND

Is always advertised, in fact it only pays to advertise good things. When you see an article advertised in this paper year after year you can be absolutely certain that there is merit to it because the continued sale of any article depends upon merit and to keep on advertising one must keep on selling. All good things have imitators, but imitations are not advertised. They have no reputation to sustain, they never expect to have any permanent sale and your dealer would never sell them if he studied your interests. Sixteen years ago Allen's Foot-Ease, the antiseptic Powder for the feet, was first sold, and through newspaper advertising and through people telling each other what a good thing it was for tired and aching feet it has now a permanent sale, and nearly 200 so-called foot powders have been put on the market with the hope of profiting by the reputation which has been built up for Allen's Foot-Ease. When you ask for an article advertised in these papers see that you get it. Avoid substitutes.

The Wrong Sort.

An old Irish peasant was one Sunday sitting in front of his cottage puffing away furiously at his pipe.

Match after match he lighted, pulling hard at the pipe the while, until at last the ground all round his feet was strewed with struck matches.

"Come in to your dinner, Patsy," at length called out his wife.

"Faith, and Oi will in a minute, Biddy," said he. "Molke Mulrooney has been a-telling me that if Oi shmoked a bit av ghlass Oi cud see the shpots on the sun. Oi don't know whether Molke's been a-fooling me or whether Oi've got hold av the wrong kind of ghlass."—Scraps.

The Nurse's Opinion.

A nurse had been called as a witness to prove the correctness of the bill of a physician.

"Let us get at the facts in the case," said the lawyer, who was doing a cross-examination stunt. "Didn't the doctor make several visits after the patient was out of danger?"

"No, sir," answered the nurse. "I considered the patient in danger as long as the doctor continued his visits."

Uncouth.

"What's the matter?"

"He actually eats the lettuce leaf the salad rests on."

Rev. G. R. Williamson Replies to Rev. James E. Connell.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Circumstances require that I again present to you a communication for publication.

My opponent, Mr. E. A. Browning, who sailed for a few weeks under the nom de plume, "Fairplay," seems to have grown tired of the battle and turned it over to the Rev. Jas. E. Connell. This is now revealed to be a perfectly natural thing for him to do, for when you compare the articles of the two gentlemen it is very easy to discover the fountain from which "Fairplay" drank.

One would hardly expect a man of Mr. Connell's temperament and education to take an active part in a live 20th century topic. I am passing this judgment now from the nature and character of the education and training received by the average Roman Catholic priest. This is revealed in the fact that Mr. C. could not find a sufficient English vocabulary in which to express his thoughts, so he occasionally ran in a Latin phrase or ejaculation, meaningless, of course, to most people, but a great relief to him. Now it is barely possible that Mr. C. wanted to make an impression on the public that he is learned or he may have thought that a display of his linguistic lore would frighten me into submission and prevent a reply to his article. Such displays are evidences, not of true learning, but of pedantry, and outside of his own henchmen no one will call him "smart," however much he may desire it.

It will be seen as we proceed that Mr. C.'s article is a quaint piece of literature. He undertakes to refute the allegations in my former article, and practically, as we shall see, admits all of them.

However, this is fairly good for a raw Irishman. When an Irishman gets mad he fulminates and effervesces. He can't help it; it is just his nature. This country would be rather lonesome without its Patties, Mikies and Jimmies, particularly the latter.

I want to say in beginning that I absolutely refuse to be drawn into mud slinging, and will not stoop to low down Billingsgate. The most casual reader can see that the Rev. Father has tried to draw me into that net.

The following are not marks of a gentleman: "Fudge," Tommyrot," "Asinine," "Fie." I forgive you, Mr. C., on the ground that you did the best you could and of course responsibility ceases there. But let me remind you that it takes more than such words to refute a proposition.

In the next place I refuse to be draw away from the main point over which all this wrangle has taken place. I would have the public note that Mr. C. is silent as the grave on the most vital point. You will never catch this pseudo-champion of the truth saying a single word against the School Board for their unwarranted and unjustified action. No indeed, he knows better. Talk about an axe to grind!

We witness in this whole thing a strange anomoly. Father C. suddenly arouses himself. Perhaps he inquires what is the year, the month, and day of the month? He finds out to his great surprise it is August 9th, 1910. "Can it be possible?" says Mr. C. "My, how I wish it was August 24, 1572." Will you Protestants please look up that date. He muses a little while longer, brushes a few ancient cobwebs out of his cranium, and in the meantime some one brings him a recent copy of THE REPUBLICAN, and he is made acquainted with my article showing the true attitude of the Papal church toward our public schools. He immediately lays down his masses, Hail Marys, bones of Saints, and other mediæval rubbish; puts on a good coat of war paint and writes an article "in the interest of truth and justice and fair play." Think of it. "Truth" and "justice," Mr. C., are mighty words, but the Roman Catholic church has never learned their meaning. Your history for proof of this. We shall now take up the more specific points in Mr. C., article.

After quoting from me, "The Catholic who holds a position as officer or teacher in the public sceool, will be from the nature of the case either false to the church and true to the school or true to the church and false to the school." He says, "The Catholic church is not now and never has been unqualifiedly inimical to the public schools." Let all who are interested in the public schools and the welfare of their children read that again and again. Look at the words "unqualifiedly" and "inimical." This sentence is the shrewdest piece of Jesuitical evasion I have ever seen. When put into a little plainer English it means that, "We are inimical or hostile to the public school, but not unqualifiedly so." Now if we could get into Mr. C.'s mental processes and find out just what he means by this specious sentence we would know better where to place him. I see the predicament in which he was placed. Had he said that his church did unqualifiedly endorse the public schools the news might reach the old gentleman in the Vatican. He would at once be considered as opposing all the utterances from the Vatican on the public school question; would be called a "modernist," and perhaps lose his ecclesiastical head.

On the other hand he must fix matters up so as to keep in harmony with the more progressive element of his own congregation and the community at large. O, yes, Mr. C., we understand what you mean by "unqualifiedly." You can give an ultra explanation both to the people and to your Bishop.

In order to be clear on this point and to let the people know that my contention is right, a few sentences on the public school question from Catholic prelates are again in order. I would have all readers of this article note that Mr. C. intimates that the quotations adduced in my article from various Catholic papers were not in keeping with the general [illegible] of the church. I did not quo[illegible] obscure back woods pr[illegible]m the highest authority in the church. But it is possible to give numerous quotations from Bishops, Cardinals, and Popes to prove my position, viz: that the Catholic church is the "implacable foe" of the public schools. Here are a few:

The Pope's bull of June 22, 1868, denounces the laws for free schools (not under Romish control), and free speech as "damnable heresies." A Catholic paper says, "All we have to do is to break down the irresponsible oligarchy of general school boards, and substitute local boards with power to select teachers, textbooks and mode of instruction." Here you have it again. They are going to be the whole push, and have it their way.

Again, "There is no possible program of common school instruction that the Catholic church can permit her children to accept." This article from which I have just quoted closes with the following words: "It is not that we declare so. It is the Catholic Church, in the famous syllabus of modern errors, condemned by the Catholic church, and which neither Bishop nor layman can dispute without the reproach of rebellion against the church." So the church, Mr. C., has spoken on this question and you know it has, and no evasion or sophistry of yours can make it appear otherwise. Here is one more sentence from the Catholic Telegraph: "The secular school system is a social cancer; the sooner it is destroyed the better." Again: "It will be a glorious day for Catholics in this country when, under the blows of justice and morality, our school system will be shivered to pieces; until then modern Paganism will triumph."

Listen, you, who love liberty and are patriotic; you, who are loyal to the stars and stripes, and would give your lives to defend old glory's honor; hear this modern Moloch posing as the only true church of Christ, this anarchistic, politico-ecclesiastical institution striking at the very bulwark of American civilization, and calling your public school system "modern Paganism."

Before taking up the most vital point of Pastor C's article I want a word on the question of public school funds. To the superficial observer the priest made a very fine point when he said that, "I was perfectly correct in saying that Catholics desire to obtain a just portion of the school funds." "Bear in mind," says the priest, "that Catholics are doubly taxed in the matter of education." How gentle! How innocent! And yet it is as venomous as a viper.

First, we admit the double taxation, but Catholics are not alone in this. Every Protestant congregation in this country takes an annual offering for their respective schools, and the tax is by no means light. Yet you never hear Protestants howling for the privilege of getting their hands into the public treasury that they may purloin a share of the public funds. This howl has gone up from Rome ever since this nation has existed, and through her political trickery she has succeeded in looting the national, state and municipal treasuries to carry on her schools. I use the word "loot" advisedly. Are not the church and state absolutely separate in this country? Our Constitution says so in one of its strongest articles. But what does Rome care for Constitutions when she wants loot? To get money she has resorted to means and devices far lower and much more reprehensible than getting money from public treasuries. The fact that the British government helps church schools is no argument. So does Spain, and poor old Spain would now like to get from under the yoke of the Vatican if she only could. If it becomes necessary to carry this discussion any further I will produce statistics from government and other reports to show to what an extent Rome has profited by draining the public treasuries.

But the priest endeavors to make his great point in the discussion of the question of the Bible in the public schools. In that connection he said some very strange things, that have no historic or other proof. In one place he accuses me of ignorance, and I do not know of any word that fits him better than the word "ignorance" in his discussion of the Bible. I think it is only fair in quoting a man to quote him correctly. He bases his whole argument on a misquotation. Here are his words. "The reverend gentleman goes out of his way to inform us that the Catholic church is not only averse to the reading of the Protestant Bible in the schools, but is hostile to the Bible generally." Now, I never said a word about the "Protestant Bible." I don't know of any such Bible. I spoke of the Bible, the King James version of it which contains all the canonical books of the Holy Scriptures. This Bible is sometimes called a "sectarian book." Please, Mr. C., to what sect does it belong? The King James translation was begun by Wickliffe in the Romish church. It was reviewed and continued by Tyndale, Coverdale and other Romanists. It was printed, published, and circulated by a Romish king. It is not a Protestant, but an English Bible, pronounced by Dr. Alexander Geddes, an ecclesiastic of the Romish church, "of all versions the most excellent for accuracy, fidelity, and the strictest attention to the letter of the text." What say you, Mr. Connell? Will you still call it "emasculated?" Such bigotry and narrowness are with those who would cast the Bible out of the public schools. No, my dear priest, the Bible is not the property of any sect. It belongs to mankind. Like the air and the sunlight, it is incapable of being monopolized.

Poor Father Connell, his education has, of course, been one sided, mediæval and prejudiced. I pity the dear man, and in the discussion of the next point will be as charitable as consistency with the truth will permit. The priest says the King James version has left out of it certain books considered canonical. Pray tell us by whom considered? Of course, he alludes to the so called apocryphal books, which have been repudiated by the best scholarship of the last five hundred years, and are not considered today by any scholar of real standing as having a place in the canonical scriptures.

But here is the trouble with our dear priest. The Catholic church is cumbered with a lot of pagan rubbish, and the people must be made to believe that this idolatry is grounded in scripture. I refer to the iniquitous "mass," the "hail Marys," "purgatory," and other unspeakable horrors perpetrated upon a deluded and long suffering people. This then is the kind of appendage Mr. C. would hang to the English Bible and ask Americans to read. Sixty million Protestants in this great country say "nay, verily," and, my dear sir, your own people are waking up to the facts, and were it not for the hordes of Europe's scum that pour into this country each year your numbers would be rapidly decreasing. You may, Mr. C., come back at me with an article in which you will attempt to argue away the above propositions. I have one argument, however, that I dare and defy you to successfully assail. "A tree is known by its fruits." You say, "where in the name of God did we get our Bible?" and then make a reference to the monks of the dark ages. I am surprised at this. Had it not been for the errors, falsehoods, and awful sins of the church there need not have been any dark ages. We give no credit whatever to the monks for our Bible. You yourself know that manuscripts of the Holy Scriptures are in existence today, written long before that monstrosity called a "monk" was ever born.

"By their fruits ye shall know them." Tell me, Mr. C., of one country on this planet where the Catholic church has had full sway that has produced a civilization worthy of the name. Tell me, please. You mention "would be reformers" and sneer at Martin Luther. But had it not been for reformers the clouds of the dark ages would not yet be lifted. Go with me to Mexico, and witness ignorance, vice and superstition too appalling to name. Rome has had almost undisputed sway there since the conquest. You have had your way for centuries in the Philippine Islands. What did we find there in 1898? The world knows. It also knows that in the last twelve years Protestant missions and the public school have done more to elevate that race than Rome did in all the centuries in which she had undisturbed sway. Now for a more concrete illustration. It is true that Rome has had her way in South America since its discovery. Let us look at results there from the cold facts of a government report. According to the last report 18 per cent. of the population of Brazil is illegitimate; 27.5 per cent. of the population of Uruguay; 50 per cent. of the population of Ecuador, and 58.5 per cent. of the population of Venezuela is illegitimate. On an average 50 per cent. of South America's population is illegitimate. Couple with this another fact: "Latin America, especially South America, is a country of appalling illiteracy. The average illiteracy of four of the leading countries is 71 per cent." For four hundred years Rome has had her schools there and these are the results. Spain and Italy are no better. There are other important arguments but this article must close.

Now Mr. Connell I want to say that until the Roman Catholic church produces results in morality and civilization, we prefer to go on using the English Bible.

And we demand that it shall be read in the public schools, and until you can show wherein, by concrete illustration, Catholicism has done or can do a better part by our youth than the public school in which the Bible is daily read, modesty at least would demand that you keep silent.

Its your play, Father.

SAMUEL LAWTON,
Board of Supervisors of Elections for Garrett County, Md.

EDMUND JAMISON, Clerk.

Mr. Warner Says That He is a Duly Registered Voter of Montgomery County.

To the Editor of The Republican:

My attention has just been called to the article signed "Sixth District Republican," which appeared in your issue on Thursday, August 11th, in which my citizenship is questioned.

I deplore the publication of such communications, for the statements made therein are incorrect, and known to be so by the gentleman who inspired the article.

In the year 1895 the name of my father was placed on the registration books of Montgomery county, by order of the Court. An appeal was taken by the Board of Election Supervisors, and in January, 1896, the Court of Appeals of Maryland, in the case reported in 83 Md. Reports, referred to in said article, ordered that his name be stricken from the registration books. The year following he was placed on the registration books of Montgomery county as a duly qualified voter of said county where his name has remained, and he, together with three of his sons, including myself, are today duly qualified and registered voters of Montgomery county.

Upon my return from abroad, in the year 1904, where I had been for several years as a United States Consul, as an appointee from Montgomery county, I became a qualified and registered voter of said county, and from that day until the present I have attended every county, congressional and state convention, always working hard for the success and interest of the Republican party.

Four years ago I was a delegate to the Republican convention which was held in Frederick, and two years ago, you may recollect, I headed the Montgomery delegation to the Congressional convention, which was held at Hagerstown. At the time, in the interests of harmony, it fell to my lot to withdraw my father's name from before the convention, as a candidate, and make Col. Pearre's nomination unanimous.

You may perhaps recollect my father was chairman of the Republican state convention, and it has never been the practice of the Maryland Republicans to go outside of the state in the selection of its party managers and officers.

I trust that in the future you will refrain from publishing in your columns communications which call to question or reflect upon my residence or citizenship in the State of Maryland. Such articles, after my nominating certificates, duly acknowledged before a notary public, have been filed with the Board of Election Supervisors in the different counties of the District, setting forth my residence and voting place, can emanate only from unreliable sources.

I trust that you will give this article the same publicity you gave to that of the "Sixth District Republican," above referred to. Yours very truly,

B. H. WARNER, JR.

Cumberland, Md., Aug. 15, 1910.

Why Not Return To Earth.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Why all this discussion about where a man comes from? What is the difference whether a man comes from West Virginia, or Maryland, or Sang Run, or Cuba, or Arkansas, or where?

In the final analysis isn't what a man is, not where he came from, that determines his measure.

Snyder and wife, by deed bearing date October 27, 1905, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 364, to which deed reference is here had for a particular description of said 68½ acres, together with all the rights and privileges as to mining rights, surface and rights of way, as were vested in said Gillespie by said deed.

This 68½ acres of coal is considered very valuable. It is located a distance of about three or four miles from the railroad.

III

An undivided one half interest in ten acres of land, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being also a part of what is known as the "Elk Garden" tract, said undivided one-half interest having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry F. Marshall and wife, by deed dated the 11th day of August 1902, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 42, folio 500, to which deed reference is had for a particular description of said property.

IV

A tract or parcel of land containing one acre, more or less, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Gorman, having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry C. Stemple and wife, by deed dated the 30th day of April, 1907, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 54, folio 451. There are situated, on this property, several buildings, one of which can be used for a combination dwelling house and store building.

All of the above described property will be sold free and acquit from all liens and incumbrances. The title to all of said property is considered good.

TERMS OF SALE. One-third cash in hand on day of sale and the residue upon a credit of six and twelve months, the purchaser to give interest bearing notes, with good personal security, for the deferred purchase money and the legal title to the property to be retained as additional security, until said deferred purchase money has been paid.

C. W. MAXWELL, Trustee.

Saturday, August 20th,

at 2 o'clock P. M., at the same place.

AN OLD MAN STRUCK BY TRAIN, SERIOUSLY INJURED

John Wesley (Governor) Lee, On Visit Home, Hurt at the Park.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. John Wesley (Governor) Lee, of New Mexico, who left Garrett county a number of years ago tor the West and returned here about two weeks ago to visit relatives and friends, was struck by a freight train at Mt. Lake Park and probably fata ly injured.

Mr. Lee was at the station at the Park and attempted to cross the tracks after a freight train had passed and did not notice that another train on the opposite track was approaching. He stepped immediately in front of the second train and was struck by the pilot of the engine, his body being thrown clear of the track and upon the brick pavement surrounding the station.

His injuries consists of both arms being broken below his elbows, a lacerated eye, concussion of the brain and a badly contussed hip. He was brought to Oakland immediately after the accident and placed in the Home Sanitorium where he is being attended by Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh.

Owing to Mr. Lee's advanced age, he being 82, the chances for his recovery are slight.

KURTZ CHAPEL.

Not seeing any items from our little village for some time will pen a few.

I guess it is useless to mention the weather, as you all know we need rain.

Mr. Wesley Lee, of Oklahoma, is visiting friends and relatives here.

Mr. H. A. Hardesty is at Davis, West Va.

Mrs. Rhoderic Paugh and Josephine Kearns were the guests of Mrs. Ella Tasker, Sunday.

Rev. James White, of Ryans Glades, preached a very interesting sermon at this place Sunday morning.

Mrs. Thomas Moon and two youngest daughters, Stella and Maud, spent Sunday with her parents at Ryan's Glade.

Mr. James Thomas, who is employed near Wabash, W. Va., spent Sunday with his mother here.

Mr. James Lish is building a new granary.

There are some kind of tics around here and after reading and listening for some we believe they are politics.

Most all of our farmers are done reaping their oats and report a fair crop.

We are glad to state that Miss Alice Clendenin, who has had a severe attack of neuralgia, is getting better.

Messrs. Robert Paugh and Scott Harvery started out with their thrashing machine Monday.

Mrs. Ella Tasker expects to leave soon for New Mexico where she has taken up a homestead.

Rev. E. P. Idleman preaceed a very inspiring and helpful sermon here Sunday afternoon.

Mrs. Fannie Coughle is on the sick list. We hope for her speedy recovery.

Messrs. Ernest and Gus Hileary were seen in this vicinity Sunday.

THE BALLOON TRIP

Traveled 331 Miles in About Ten Hour.

The Philadelphia Record contained the following article in reference to the balloon which landed in Garrett county last Wednesday morning:

After a thrilling and record-breaking night flight of twelve hours and thirty-five minutes, the balloon Philadelphia II and its three passengers, Ira L. Brown, Dr. George H. Simmerman and Dr. Thomas Eldridge, pilot, landed safely Wednesday morning at 9.05 on top of Negro Mountain, Garrett county, Md. Ten hours later their anxious friends in this city, who had seen the balloon rise from Point Breeze at 8:30 the night before and disappear in the darkness, borne on the wings of a 20-mile breeze, received their first news of the voyagers in the shape of this telegram from Grantsville, Md.:

"Broke local time record. Landed at 9.05, Negro Mountain, Maryland. Very cold crossing the Allegheny Mountains. Wonderful cloud effects night and day. Altitude, 14,000 feet. Distance about 331 miles."

While the balloonists failed to accomplish the main purpose of their trip, to make the first air voyage across the boundary line into Canada, they did succeed in fulfilling their second purpose, of winning the local record for time in the air. This they did by the narrow margin of five minutes, their time being 12 hours and 35 minutes against the 12 hours and 30 minutes set by the Ben Franklin, which, strangely enough, landed also on Maryland soil. The distance traversed on Wednesday's trip is second only to the record established by Dr. Eldridge and Welsh Strawbridge on a recent flight, which began in this city and ended near Danbury, N. H., a distance of about 350 miles.

The ascension was favorable in every respect, except in the direction of the wind, which blew almost directly from the east, instead of from the southeast, as the balloonists had hoped. The moon was shining, however, and the sky was just cloudy enough to make a delightful picture for the air navigators. The wind carried them rapidly out of the range of vision of the spectators and at 8:55 they were already passing over Swathmore. Their landing place is almost directly in line with the direction which the balloon took at the start, showing remarkably steady winds and the absence of the southerly breezes which were counted upon to swing the bag northward into Canadian territory.

Negro Mountain is about five miles from Grantsville, the village from which the first telegram was sent, and about 25 miles directly west of Cumberland, Md. It is not more than 20 miles from the western boundary of Maryland and about five miles from the line of Somerset county, Pennsylvania.

BRIDE OF FEW MONTHS KILLED

Mrs. Walter Coleman, Aged 16 Years, Struck by Engine at Beryl.

Mrs. Walter Coleman was struck by a B. & O. helper engine at Beryl last Friday and was so severely injured that she died without regaining consciousness after being taken to the Hoffman Hospital at Keyser. She stepped off one track from in front of a fast freight train and the noise drowned that of the engine approaching on the other track. She was sixteen years old and was married on the 3rd of July last. She was Miss Myrtle Cummings before marriage and her home was at Altamont.

INTER-STATE GOOD ROADS CONVENTION

To Be Held at Mountain Lake Park September 6-8, 1910.

The second annual convention of the Inter-State Good Roads Association will convene at Mountain Lake Park on Tuesday, September 6th, and will last until Thursday, the 8th.

At the convention Governor Crothers, of Maryland, and Governor Glasscock, of West Virginia, will be present and make addresses; also a large number of good roads advocates from various states of the Union are expected to address the convention, including Hon. Logan W. Page, the United States Director of Roads.

The county commissioners of almost every county in Maryland and West Virginia have appointed delegates to attend the convention. From one of the lower counties of this State a large delegation of prominent agriculturalists, appointed by the board of county commissioners, have advised Dr. W. W. Davis, corresponding secretary of the Good Roads Association, that they will attend.

From this county the Board of County Commissioners in session last week appointed the following representatives to attend the sessions of the conference:

District No. 1—Harry C. Hershman, F. R. Sharpless, Joseph Shank, B. T. Bray, A. M. T. Warnick.

District No. 2—F. T. Fike, D. S. Custer, Melville G. Friend, Jefferson Lowdermilk, W. E. Hollinger.

District No. 3—C. D. Hershberger, U. M. Stanton, David Pope, John Stark, G. W. Broadwater.

District No. 4—Jacob Stump, George L. Michaels, Fred Broadwater, P. R. Titchinell, S. A. Duckworth.

District No. 5—Henry Spiker, James E. McGettigan, D. O. Dewitt, Henry Kolb, C. A. Guthrie.

District No. 6—W. A. Smith, John Sines, Marshall Frankhouser, Duke McLean, Thomas Bishoff.

District No. 7—J. L. Echard, Roy O. Winters, Joseph Sebolt, G. B. M. Friend, W. R. Stull.

District No. 8—Joseph Conneway, W. R. Mason, David Gnagey, A. D. Harvey, John H. Sanders.

District No. 9—Urias McKenzie, B. F. Green, Thomas J. Johnson, James Carey, William Blocher.

District No. 10—Columbus Paugh, James L. Harvey, George W. Moon, P. J. Lohr, James Lish.

District No. 11—Hugh Weir, H. H. Robeson, William Jacobs, Cornelius Smith, John Merrill.

District No. 12—Jacob Brenneman, John Hetrick, Peter Stark, A. J. Oester, Jonas Bittinger.

District No. 13—J. B. Moore, A. G. Barrick, Milo Wilson, A. C. Smith, L. C. Bray.

District No. 14—John W. Markley, B. C. Scott, Newton Reams, A. L. Sines, M. J. Hughes.

The program for the conference, which was prepared by Dr. Davis and his associates is as follows:

LARGE AUDITORIUM ON FIRE

Crossed Wires Started Blaze and Structure May Have Been Destroyed.

Only by the timely discovery of a fire in the basement of the large auditorium at Mountain Lake Park on last Friday night, caused by crossed electric wires, was the building saved from total destruction, and the loss of many thousands of dollars averted.

Dr. Davidson, the superintendent, had delayed his departure from the building after the evening's entertainment had closed and while attending to some matters upon the platform smoke was noticed issuing from the stairway leading from the basement. A hurried inspection was made and the fire was discovered leaping upward along the wall from a point where the charged electric wires came in contact. By the application of a few buckets of water the fire was extinguished and the handsome building saved as a prey of the flames.

DEER PARK.

Lord Linton, of Grosvenor Square, London, England, with his wife and daughters, Miss Imogene and Mrs. H. Blessing, have apartments at the Deer Park Hotel. Lord Linton is interested in West Virginia timber lands, and he and Col. John T. McGraw, of Grafton, have been in consultation the past week at Rosemont, the summer home of the McGraws.

At Hunting Ridge, the cottage of Mr. and Mrs. J. Swan Frick, of Baltimore, Col. Osmun Latrobe is having a very pleasant visit. Col. Latrobe comes to Deer Park every summer. Hunting Ridge embraces a little over 100 acres. It is all under the highest state of cultivation so that Mr. Frick, its owner, is a Garrett county farmer as well as a prince of entertainers among his friends. The grounds surrounding the main dwelling are perfectly kept, and the grove of massive oaks in the rear of the property is beautiful.

The Grimes family, of Pittsburg, are passing the summer very agreeably at Glamorgan, their summer home here.

At Rosemont cottage, the home of Col. John T. McGraw, his mother and sister, Miss Rose McGraw, Dr. and Mrs. A. S. Warder, and Charles Durbin and family, all of Grafton, are being entertained. Mrs. Durbin and Mrs. Warder are sisters of Col. McGraw. Rosemont was formerly the summer home of Henry Gassaway Davis, now of Elkins, W. Va.

The Deer Park Hotel is now filled with guests. This is the very height of the fashionable season, and from now on until the last of August and a little after that, gayety will reign supreme. The weather is perfect, and the numerous guests are enjoying themselves by the aid of golf and tennis, walking parties and endless other diversions of a varied character.

The first golf tournament of the season was held Friday, Mr. Josias Pennington, of Baltimore, being the victor. He had a handicap of four, but also the lowest gross score. Mr. Joseph T. Hanlon, also of Baltimore, was second. The scratch men, Mr. Julius Polloch, Jr., of Wheeling, and Mr. Lansburg, of Washington, both made an 80 and were tied for fifth place.

Mrs. Lashorn, of Deer Park, is entertaining Miss Hattie Coleman, of Pittsburg.

NEW GERMANY.

As I have not noticed any items from this place for some time I thought I would write a few for your paper.

Cutting and hauling oats is the order of the day.

Mr. Alvie Green, of Moscow, was the guest of Miss Clara Stark Sunday.

Messrs. Lee Durst and Gideon Miller, of Akron, Ohio, are here visiting friends and relatives.

Mrs. Carrie Duckworth and daughter Evelyn are visiting Mrs. H. M. Broadwater.

Miss Pearl Otto, who has been staying with her sister, Mrs. Elmer Beachy, has returned to her home.

Mrs. Sam Miller and daughter Bessie will leave for their home in Columbus in the near future.

Messrs. H. M. and David Broadwater have gone into the chopping business. They have purchased a large chop mill and being a new company they would like their friends to patronize them.

THE DEATH RECORD.

BRUCE S. FOREMAN.

Bruce S. Foreman, aged thirty-four years and three months, died of diphtheria at Piedmont, W. Va., where he had resided with his wife and four children during the past year, on last Thursday morning after an illness extending over a week. His body was sent to Oakland Friday morning and taken to the home of his father, Ami Foreman, a few miles south of Oakland, and interred. Mr. Foreman was at one time employed by an insurance company and later as a representative of a baking powder concern. His death was a great shock to his family, who have the sympathy of all.

BABY CHADDERTON.

An infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred Chadderton, of Deer Park, died very suddenly on Monday, August 15th, and was buried Wednesday, August 17th, in the cemetery at Deer Park. We sympathize with the sorrowing parents in their loss. He came as a blossom of love loaned from God and when he had gladdened the earth for a little while God took him unto Himself to bloom in the eternal gardens above. Untainted by sin he passed from earth to heaven. C. W. HUDSON.

WATER SHORTAGE ON LINE OF THE B. & O.

Drought is Causing Trouble At Points West of Oakland.

Owing to shortage of water, conditions have become alarming along the line of the B. & O. All through trains east have been taking water at Newburg, and some of the trains usually taking water at Rowlesburg going west have been backed off at Newburg for water. Water is being hauled to Newburg from Grafton, and to Terra Alta and Rowlesburg from Oakland, where it can be obtained. It is reported that there are more than a dozen dead engines at Terra Alta, the water having given out at that point and the fires pulled.

The Porter-Brocklehurst Co., and the Simms Co., are also seriously handicapped for water and progress with the third track grading is slow for that reasons. The machinery for the placing of the large dam up Possum Hollow near Newburg, is being hauled and the work of grading has already begun. This dam is to be one of the largest in West Virginia, and will altogether alleviate conditions arising from a shortage of water. When completed and filled it will contained about fifty millions gallons of water, covering a space of more than fifteen acres.

Just as soon as the Porter-Brocklehurst Co. completes the third track grading, they will move their machinery to Three Fork, where they will grade the extension of the Hardman Branch seven miles up the valley to the mouth of Bird Creek where new mines will be open for coking purposes. This branch again makes possible the development of the rich iron ore deposits along this valley, which were worked at Irondale several years ago, and abandoned.

The water being hauled from Oakland is taken from the Little Yough. A dam has been constructed at the pump station here, but on Monday the two large pumps at work drained the pool and as a result one of the pumps was shut down. Oakland is the only point between 40-Water Station and Grafton where water may be obtained and unless rain falls within the next few days the situation here will become very serious.

At the municipal pumping station the supply seems to be adequate for present uses.

CHAUTAUQUA CLOSED LAST NIGHT

End of the Most Successful Season at Mountain Lake Park.

The season of 1910 at Mountain Lake Park will be remembered as the most successful since the Park was established more than twenty-five years ago. The crowds attending the Chautauqua were never greater nor were the people of a higher class intellectually. The program as a whole was as good or better than for many years.

Last night the season closed so far as the Chautauqua is concerned but hundreds of people will remain at the Park for several weeks to come in order to enjoy the early months of the fall.

MYSTERIOUS END OF BARNUM BOY

Son of Isaac Ashley Shot by Stray Bullet While He was at Play.

Saturday at Barnum, a ten-year-old son of Isaac Ashley, a stable boss for the Marstellar Coal Company, met with instant death and the direct cause will probably always remain a mystery. Young Ashley and a brother a year or two his senior, were playing in a clearing near home. Suddenly the boy fell and his brother discovered blood flowing from a wound in his neck. When help was had the lad was dead. Dr. Z. T. Kalbaugh, of Piedmont, who was in attendance at the postmortem examination, said death was produced by a gunshot wound. The surving brother claims he heard a shot in the big woods nearby where the tragedy occurred. As no reason for wilful murder can be had, it is supposed the bullet was fired by some hunter in the woods at game or a mark, and traveled some distance from a long range rifled firearm.

The lad's name was Henry Snyder Ashley. When the accident occurred the mother rushed out of the house immediately on hearing the shot and picked up her boy, who died a few minutes later, the shot having gone clear through his neck. The remains of the little fellow were buried Monday afternoon in Height's grave yard, near Hampshire.

BITTINGER.

Joel Orendorf, district assessor, attended a meeting of the assessors at Oakland last Saturday, and when returning along the State road near Oakland an automobile recklessly driven ran up without warning and collided with his buggy doing some damage to the vehicle.

Cleaver Brenneman, who spent the last year in the west, and who was recently married at Waterloo, Iowa, is spending a few days with his and his wife's relatives here.

Mrs. Annie Grady, of Grantsville, spent last Sunday at this place.

Miss Bessie Wiley, who spent a few weeks at Mt. Lake Park, returned to her home at this place last Friday.

N. U. Bond, accompanied by Miss Johnson, of Oakland, spent a few hours in this village last Saturday, and while here Mr. Bond addressed a large company of people who were holding a Sunday school picnic in the village grove.

Dr. Muncaster, of Washington, D. C., was a visitor to this village last Saturday.

Rev. Young, of Elk Lick, Pa., preached an effective sermon from the Lutheran pulpit in this village last Saturday evening, before a large and appreciative audience.

Messrs. C. M. Miller, of Swanton, M. K. Malone, of Elizabeth, Pa., and Rev. Bastian, of Keyser, delivered addresses on the occasion of the picnic held here last Saturday.

Basket Picnic.

The Underwood Sunday School will hold a basket picnic and festival at Cherry Creek school house September 10, 1910, for the benefit of the Underwood church. A special invitation to Sunday schools, who will be entertained by speaking and vocal and instrumental music. Refreshments served on the grounds.

The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

Relic of Jail-Fever Days

A curious custom still observed in the central criminal court of London is that of placing sweet herbs on the bench. It dates from the days when jail-fever was prevalent and the rankness of the air in the courts was such that it was necessary to provide some counteracting scent for those whose duty it was to administer justice.

HOUR GLASS OF RECORD SIZE

In London there stands an hour glass that undoubtedly is the largest ever constructed. It contains more than 100 pounds of sand. When the lower bulb is filled the frame turns over, and the process is reversed to mark the flight of another 60 minutes. So huge is this glass that the revolution is made by a hydraulic engine, shown on the left of the picture. The height of the glass is nearly 12 feet.

LIGHTNING CAME BY PHONE

While the sun was shining the other day at Clinton, N. J., and there was no indication of an electrical storm, a bolt of lightning struck a liberty pole in front of a hotel shattering the shaft and scaring a team of mules so badly that they ran two miles. The team was tied to a ring attached to the pole, which was thirty feet high. After the animals had been stopped it was found that the bolt of lightning which had shattered the pole had also melted the iron shoes from each of the mules. Otherwise they were uninjured. The source of the lightning bolt puzzled all the local electrical experts and meteorologists, but after investigation it was found that a telephone wire running from Singac passed so close to the flag pole as to touch it. At the time the pole was struck a fierce thunder storm was raging in the vicinity of Singac, and the theory is that lightning striking the telephone wire in the storm zone, traveled over the cable until it encountered the uninsulated liberty pole, where the full force of the bolt was spent.

CHILD WITH TWO HEADS

A most wonderful child is the six-year-old daughter of John O. Nelson of Brooklyn Hills, N. Y. She has two well developed heads; and though unable either to sit up or walk, her general health is good, and she possesses normal intelligence.

When the child was born the doctors said she could not live, but Mr. Nelson, possessed of considerable means, engaged the best physicians and gave the little one the most careful attention, sparing no expense in trying to make the delicate infant a healthy child. According to her father the child speaks English and German with equal fluency, using both mouths when she speaks.

WILD GEESE ATTACK GIRLS

Wild geese, which William Stabley, of Felton, Pa., thought he had domesticated, proved still untamed when they attacked and frightened almost to death Miss Ophelia Paine and Miss Araminta Sentz, who were gathering arbutus. The flock surrounded the two girls, picking at them and hissing in an alarming manner. The girls fled, but the geese continued the chase almost to the town.

HOARD IN A FLOATING LOG

A party of campers from Seattle were hauling a gigantic cedar log upon the beach of Lake Washington to be converted into firewood when what appeared to be a huge plug attracted their attention. One ran for the axe and the log was split into two pieces. The plug acted as a door of a safety vault where some logger twenty years ago had hidden his savings. There were $600 in gold, $68 in silver and $500 in currency. The name, though, dim, on the post office money orders appears to be Claude Parsons or Parker, and they are payable in the post office at Eau Claire, Wis. The money orders are dated April, 1891.

Efforts will be made to find the rightful owner of the hoard. Many stories are told of the prodigality with which loggers handled their money in the halcyon days of logging. A favorite bank was to put a boom augur hole in a big stump. Into this hole was put the gold, silver and paper and a big plug driven into the hole. The plug was then sawed off plumb with the bark and the wealth left until wanted. Many of these improvised banks were swept away by floods or destroyed in forest fires.

RODENT HAS MONEY TO BURN

A pet red squirrel belonging to Otto Speltz, farmer, of Bellingham, Wash., has been under surveillance ever since he was discovered tearing a $5 Canadian bill to pieces. Speltz rescued the money and sent it to Ottawa for redemption.

He had no more than despatched the letter containing the shreds of the five than the squirrel was found playing with a piece of a United States $10 bill.

Speltz garnered this money in before it was too damaged for barter, and is now watching the movements of his pet. It is believed the rodent has discovered a hidden hoard laid away in past years by a miser or cached by a robber in a hollow tree and found by the squirrel.

CAT BRINGING UP ROBINS

A cat on the farm of Fred Schmetto near Marinette, Wis., is bringing up two young robins with her litter of kittens. The fledglings were found there one morning and the cat was caressing them.

It is believed that she killed the parent bird and then took the little ones out of the nest and brought them to the box in which her kittens are stored.

WHEN THE DEAD RETURN

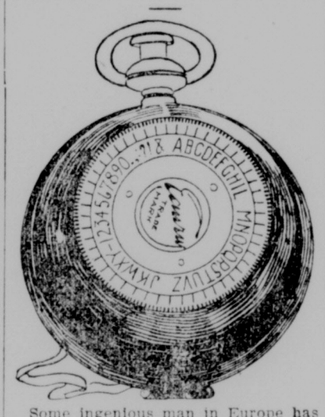
This is a story of mistaken identity of remarkable character. Mary McGonigle was struck by a trolley car in New York last April and died shortly afterwards in a hospital. On notification from the coroner, her relatives came to view the body and she was identified by her son, her sister, her brother and a cousin; a burial permit was issued in the name of Mary McGonigle; an insurance company paid $117 on the life of Mary McGonigle; the traction company paid $350 for the funeral of Mary McGonigle; the body of Mary McGonigle now lies in Calvary cemetery.

Late one night recently Mary McGonigle in the flesh walked into her sister's home.

To say there was surprise at her visit would understate the emotions of the relatives. The sister screamed; the brother dropped his new clay pipe and a small niece fainted. Mrs. McGonigle herself was surprised but placid; she had not read the newspapers, and did not know that she was supposed to be dead.

Then came explanations. Mary McGonigle had been buried all right, but it was the wrong Mary. The living woman is in private service and her address fluctuates with her employment. The dead woman who bears such an extraordinary resemblance to her was no relative, but had known her, and had given her address to the hospital. The undertaker who buried the late Mary, was summoned to view the living Mary. "I never saw such a resemblance," he gasped, "and I've buried many."

SMALLEST OF TYPEWRITERS



Some ingenious man in Europe has invented a typewriter so small that it can be carried in the waistcoat pocket. This tiniest of all writing-machines is made in the form of a watch. The letters make their mark under the pressure of the knob within the ring and the writing is done on a narrow strip of glued paper.

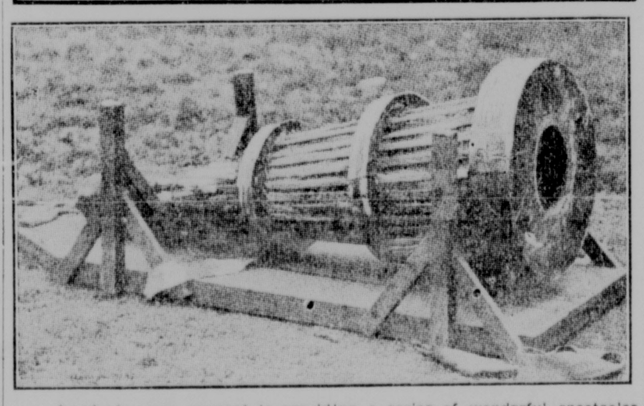
PATRIARCHAL WEDDING PARTY

There was a gay gathering of merry veterans at a wedding ceremony in Rome the other week, the happy couple being Signor Gaspare Finale, the oldest member of the Italian senate, who is ninety-five, and a charming widow of some eighty-six summers. The official witnesses at the ceremony were Senator Greffi, the late ambassador, who is ninety-three, and Senator Farani, who is in his ninety-first year.

FIFTY-POUND HAILSTONE

The notoriety of setting a new standard for all stories of big hailstones befell William Dittenhafer, a cellar digger of York, Pa., entirely unsolicited. He found a mass of many hailstones congealed or melted together, thirty-six inches long, fourteen inches wide and five inches thick, in a deep depression in the lawn. This mass weighed more than fifty pounds.

Cannon Used at Agincourt



London's army pageant is providing a series of wonderful spectacles for the people and at the same titme gives them valuable lessons in the history of warfare since the earliest days of the English as a nation. All the costumes are historically correct and in many of the tableaux there are used the actual weapons of the period represented. The old cannon, including a serpentine gun used in the battle of Agincourt, attract especial attention.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

CRIME AND DRINK IN CANADA

Statistics Show That Convictions Due to Liquor Has Increased Considerably.

Criminal statistics for the year ended September, 1906, have just been issued by the census bureau at Ottawa. They look somewhat antiquated now, but as they are the latest available, some of the facts given are still of interest. The figures deal separably with indictable offences and summary convictions, the latter referring to cases disposed of by justices of the peace. British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario show a crime record remarkable figures relate to the maritime provinces, where the Scott act is in force in most counties, but especially Prince Edward island, the only province in the dominion with provincial prohibition. Ontario's crime ratio for 10,000 of the population shows a gradual increase: 1897-1900, 12.94; 1900-1905, 13.38; 1906, 15.89.

Of the total number of persons convicted during the five-year period ending with 1905 there was an average of 56 per cent. who used liquor moderately and 33 per cent. who were immoderate drinkers. For the second period ending with 1905 there was an average of 60 per cent. moderate and 28 immoderate drinkers, as compared with 57 per cent. moderate and 23 per cent. moderate drinkers for 1906. The balance of the 100 in each period were either nondrinkers or not given.

Dealing with summary convictions, which are for offences such as assaults, breaches of the peace, infractions of various laws, such as liquor license act, etc., and such other offences as vagrancy, drunkenness, and disorderly conduct, the report states that the number of summary convictions has increased considerably throughout the several provinces during the last five years.

During the years ending with 1905, drunkenness represented about 35 per cent. of the total summary convictions, as compared with 40 per cent. for the year 1906. Out of the total number of persons convicted for drunkenness, female offenders represented 8.87 per cent. for the ten years ending with 1905, as against 5.10 per cent. for the year 1906.

Taking the year 1906, the following table shows the percentage of convictions for drunkenness of each province, with the percentage of population of the provinces:

Provinces.	Percentage of Convictions for Drunkenness.	Percentage of Population.
Prince Edward island	0.48	1.69
Nova Scotia	11.62	7.76
New Brunswick	7.34	5.62
Quebec	19.12	29.08
Ontario	29.71	37.10
Manitoba	15.55	6.11
British Columbia	6.76	4.09
The territories	9.42	8.55

The following table shows the convictions for drunkenness in each province, with the convictions per 1,000 of population:

Provinces.	Number.	Per 1,000 Inhabitants.
Prince Edward island	120	1.19
Nova Scotia	2,919	6.28
New Brunswick	1,843	5.48
Quebec	4,802	2.76
Ontario	7,459	3.36
Manitoba	3,905	10.68
British Columbia	1,697	6.93
The territories	2,365	4.62
Canada	25,110	4.20

LESS LIQUOR IN SCOTLAND

Citizens of Edinburgh Congratulate Themselves on Satisfactory Report of Chief Constable.

Edinburgh people are congratulating themselves on the satisfactory nature of the report just issued by the chief constable for the city for the year 1909. It shows that during that year arrests for drunkenness, crime and disorders of all kinds were fewer than they have been since reliable statistics of this kind have been kept by the authorities.

The total number of persons arrested for all kinds of offenses, drunkenness included, was 13,411 in 1909, as compared with 15,279 in 1908, a decrease of 1,868. That the poorer people in Edinburgh seem to be getting more sober is shown by the fact that whereas in 1908 the number of persons arrested for being drunk and incapable, drunk and disorderly, or drunk in charge of children or vehicles was 7,331, the number last year fell to 5,521, a decrease of 1,810.

Much speculation has been indulged in as to the causes which have led to this welcome decrease of drunkenness in Edinburgh and it may be said that the same decrease has been noted in other large towns in the country. The extra duty on spirits imposed by the budget was undoubtedly, as the chancellor of the exchequer now knows to his cost, followed by an almost immediate decrease in the consumption of whisky.

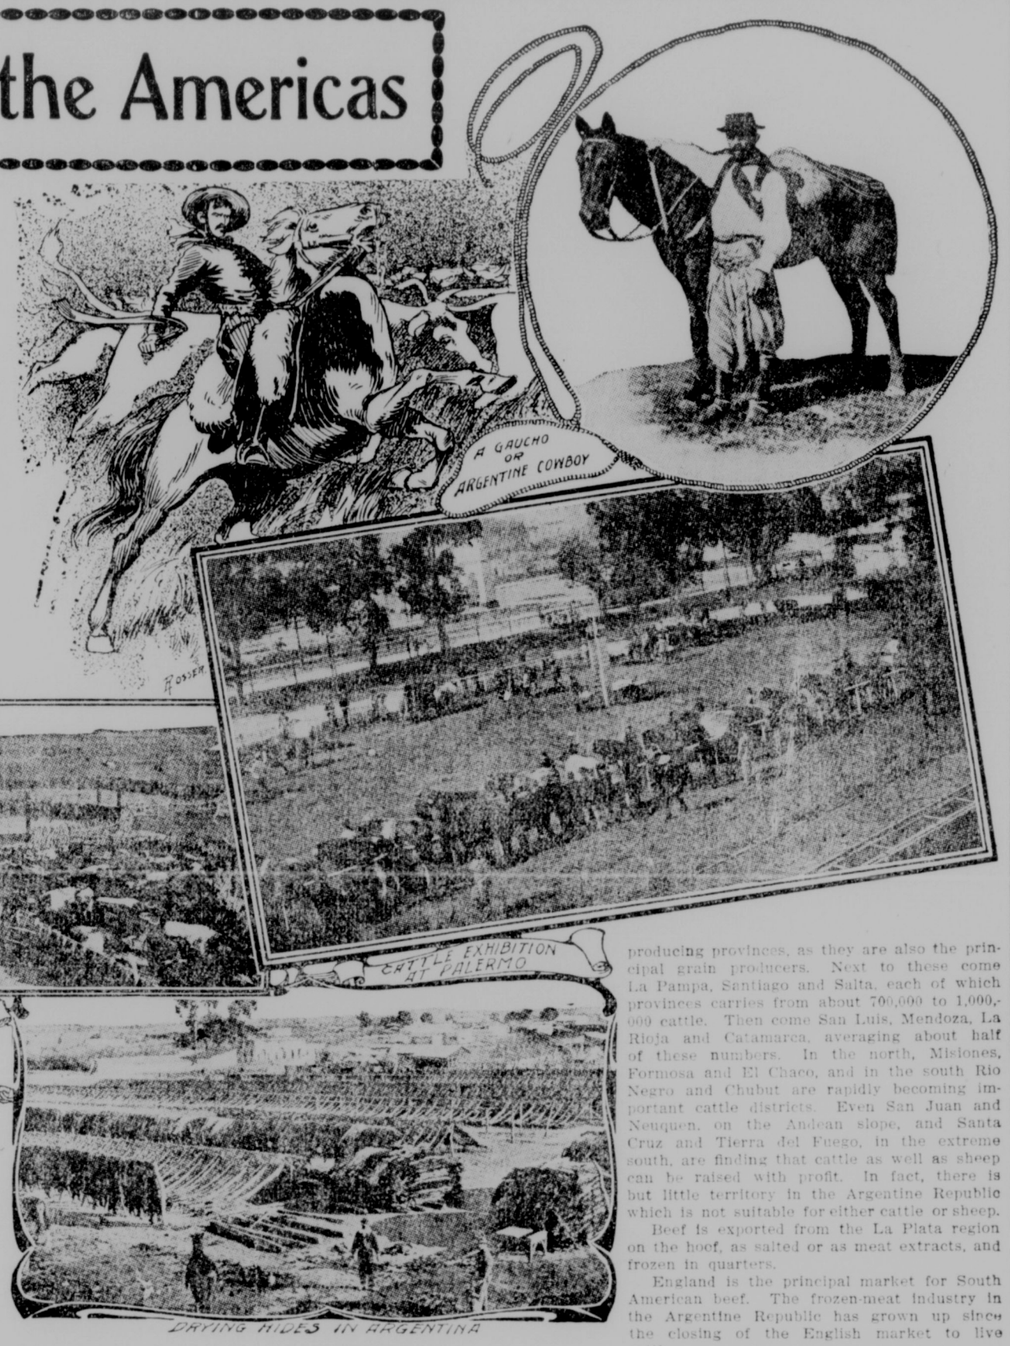
Cattle Raising in the Americas



WHEN the United States ceases to be an exporter of beef and pork from whence will Europe get its meat?

Will the United States, with its large ratio of increase in population, with which the meat produuction by no means keeps pace, be able in the future to feed itself?

Must Europe and the United States curtail their meat consumption?

There is no need to take a pessimist's view in answering any of these questions. The meat proposition is already serious, it is true; but this is because we are at the turning of the ways and not because the immediate future, or even the future for some hundreds of years at least, presents any real difficulty to the solution of this proposition.

Leaving out of consideration all questions involving the so-called meat trust, the tariff, etc., and looking at the matter simply as a question of economy in meat production, there is no need to fear a famine, nor ought there to be any fear of high prices to limit the consumption.

A number of factors enter into the world's present meat problem, one of the most important of which is the change in conditions under which meat has been produced in the United States. The change from range to farm production of beef cattle and the improved shipping facilities for corn, which latter has revolutionized the hog industry, have together upset the balance in the meat market. Unlimited free range on government lands made cheap meat, but the taking up of these lands by settlers, and particularly the taking up of land around water sites has changed the whole situation. The extension of railways and an improved service has given the western farmer a choice, either to sell his corn or to feed for meat, where formerly he had no choice; it was either hogs or cease raising corn. He raised hogs because he was forced to it, and he bought range beef cattle to put them in condition for the market by feeding for a few months with a part of his surplus grain.

The raising of cattle on the free ranges of the west was the cheapest method of meat production at the time practised in the United States, but it is a question whether beef may not now be produced, and is not now produced by a few farmers, even cheaper than on the western ranges in the past.

The poor quality of range meat, which necessitated several months of farm feeding and care in order to be gotten in condition for the market, the great losses in the herds due to insufficient food and water, and the lack of winter shelter made the business of cattle raising on the western plains a more or less uncertain and precarious industry. It was an exotic, and as such it will die with changing conditions.

The future of meat producitton in the United States is a farming proposition, and like all other questions connected with the national agriculture depends for its satisfactory solution upon the improvement of farm methods. To remain a meat-exporting country, lands must be brought up to the European standard of production. At that standard, or even considerably below, farming in the United States pays, and pays well, and in no way better than by turning grass and grain into meat. But until the United States adjusts itself to the changed conditions and can again enter the European market as a competitor with Argentina, Uruguay and Australia for the meat trade, where will Europe, and even the United States, should it have a temporary need for meat, secure their supplies?

The answer to this question is not difficult. It is only surprising that it has not been more fully recognized.

The broad plains of Mexico and Central America, of Venezuela and Colombia, the Amazon region of Brazil, Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador rival, if they do not excel the famed pampas of Argentine and Uruguay as cheap meat-producing districts.

In the country of the Oronoco alone, Venezuela and eastern Colombia, there is an area of territory more than equal to France, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Denmark, or ten times the size of the state of New York, which has its superior as a cattle country in no part of the world, if indeed it has anywhere its equal.

Mexico offers many advantages to the stock raiser. The conditions there are those with which stockmen from the United States are more or less familiar, which last fact, in part, accounts for the large investments of American capital made in this industry within the last few years in Mexico. Cattlemen own the land in large tracts of from 100,000 to 1,000,000 acres, acquired from the government by grant and at a very low figure. This prevents the shutting off from water, which has done so much to destroy the range industry in the United States. The winters are mild and there is no danger of loss from blizzards—in fact, the grazing is good all the year round.

The character of the ranges on the Pacific coast side in Jalisco, Michoacan, Guerrero, southern Oaxaca and Tepic are similar in character to the northern ranges but not so well watered, and the grass is scantier.

On the gulf side there are entirely different conditions. On the slope of the eastern Cordilleras in the states of San Luis Potosi, Tamaulipas and northern Vera Cruz is the region known ts the Huasteca Potosina, the country of the Tamesi, Panuco, Temporal and Tamasunchale rivers. This is an almost ideal grass country. It is a succession of valleys separated by grass-covered terraces or hills increasing in height from the low plains near the coast to the borders of the central plateau 6,000 feet. This slope receives the moist breezes from the Gulf of Mexico in the form of rain during the summer months and dew in winter, and is always free from frost, drought and excessive heat. The natural pasturage of this country is as fine as any in the world, except on the Oronoco and in the upper Amazon country. Cattle in good condition can be sent to market at a cost of less than $10 gold a head. On the northern and western ranges lean cattle cost to produce from $2 to $5 a head and can be fattened for market to cost in all about $10 a head.

The latest Mexican statistics show about 5,250,000 beef cattle in the whole country, of an estimated value of about $8 gold per head. Chihuahua and Vera Cruz lead with about 400,000 head for each state. As compared with Argentina with its 30,000,000 beef cattle it can be seen that Mexico is but at the beginning of the industry; in fact, as present the country produces but little meat above its own needs, yet it could, on natural pasture alone, carry twice the number of cattle now grazing in Argentina, and could easily supply to the European markets from its surplus an amount of meat twice what the United States has even been able to supply from its surplus.

South of Mexico in Central America and in parts of Mexico not above mentioned there is yet another cattle country, where the climate is more tropical. On the Pacific side the area suitable for cattle is limited. It is similar to the Pacific slope of Mexico, but the country is more thickly settled, a larger portion of the land is devoted to agriculture, and consequently there is less room for beef cattle. The country offers fine opportunities for dairy stock and will undoubtedly develop along this line. In the uplands and on the Atlantic slope there are large areas of fine open country in Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, where cattle can be produced as cheaply as anywhere in the world. It is a known fact that in Guatemala and Honduras four-year-old stock can be produced on the ranges to cost less than $2 a head. The native stock needs improving. It is the same which was formerly known in the United States as the Texas long horn. When crossed by Shorthorn bulls the resulting progeny is a first-class beef animal. Hereford, Galloway and Aberdeen-Angus crosses also produce good results.

At present the industry is almost entirely local. Millions of acres of the finest pasturage in the world, where the native grasses stand from knee to shoulder high, are unutilized. A tithe of the capital and enterprise which have produced such large results in Argentina and Uruguay would make Central America, although limited in area, an important factor in the world's meat market and would pay to the investors a handsome return on their investment.

In South America there are three great natural cattle regions which in area and adaptability for cattle production are unequaled in any other part of the world. The plains of the Oronoco, of the Amazon and of the Plata rivers are without doubt the best adapted for producing beef cattle cheaply and on a large scale of any other sections of either the old or the new world.

Behind the Venezuelan coast range of mountains lies the basin of the Oronoco. This river has nearly 500 tributaries and at its greatest length is 1,500 miles long and is navigable from the ocean for about 1,200 miles. For about half its length it flows north and then turns almost directly east and continues in this line to the Atlantic. Near the bend of the Oronoco it is joined by the Apure, one of its chief tributaries, which has come down from the eastern Cordilleras of Colombia through the heart of the region of the llanos or prairie lands. These lands continue on to the east to the vertex of the delta of the Oronoca. They comprise about 150,000 square miles in Venezuela and about 120,000 square miles in Colombia. It is the largest single compact area of high-class natural pasture in the world. In the luxuriance of its grasses it is as far ahead of the pampas lands of Argentina as are these ahead of the short-grass lands of Kansas or Nebraska. It is one immense level prairie, thickly carpeted with para and guineo grass, growing twice as high as broom sedge on a neglected Virginia farm. It is crossed and interlaced by hundreds of rivers flowing into the Oronoco or into its larger tributaries, the Apure, the Arauca, the Meta, the Vichada and the Guaviare. From these rivers spread out smaller rivers, creeks and guts joining one river to another so that the whole is one great water mesh. In some places for a hundred miles one must cross water every half mile or less. The creeks and guts, when wide enough are navigable for launches and flatboats and offer the best and cheapest possible system of highways leading directly down to the Oronoco and the sea.

From the earliest days of the Spanish conquest this country has been famed as a cattle land. At the time of the war of independence, in 1812, it was estimated that there were 3,000,000 head of cattle in the country. The industry has never since been so flourishing. These natural cattle lands comprise about 170,000,000 acres and could easily carry 180,000,000 beef cattle and not be overstocked.

In the past the industry has been much hampered in both Columbia and Venezuela by government restrictions, monopolies and taxation, and the estimates as to the cost of cattle production in consequence vary much. Under the same favorable conditions as exist in Mexico, Argentina and Uruguay the llanos of Colombia and Venezuela can produce cattle ready for slaughter at a cost which ought not to exceed $2 gold per head.

In the valley of the Amazon there are no such great prairie lands as exist on the Oronoco, yet on the whole there is as much or even more first-class cattle country, a considerable part of which is in easy deep-water connection with the world's markets.

The Amazon basin comprises one-eighth of the habitable earth and one-half of the most fertile portion thereof. In a territory so large as this it would be unreasonable not to expect to find many varieties of soil and soil cover, and such is the fact. Between the rivers tributary to the great river and back from the bottoms are here and there large tracts of open land similar to that found on the Gulf coast of Mexico, in the prairie lands of Louisiana and in Honduras and in Guatemala. This is all fine cattle country; there could be no better.

Near the headwaters of the great rivers that flow down to make the mighty Amazon, on the eastern slope of the Andes, are millions of acres of fine grass lands in Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia, as well as in Brazil, that are more immediately available for cattle raising than are the lands farther east in the great basin.

The third great river basin of South America is that of the Plate river, with which must be included the southern half of Argentina, whose rivers drain directly into the Atlantic. Any account of the cattle industry of Argentina must of necessity be less a story of what can be done than of what has been done. Included in the Plate basin in addition to Argentina are Uurguay, Paraguay and southern Brazil. The cattle conditions are similar over all this area.

Argentina ranks third in the world as a cattle-producing country. Russia and the United States alone lead it; but Argentina has only about 6,000,000 inhabitants to feed, which accounts for the fact that it is the leading country in beef exports. Russia and the United States must consume most of what they raise; Argentina ships the greater proportion of what it raises, not only beef cattle, but horses, sheep, wool, corn, wheat and flaxseed.

At the last census, taken about two years ago, there were 29,116,620 cattle in Argentina and about 6,000,000 in Uruguay. This is nearly all grade stock of the best English blood—Shorthorn, Hereford and Aberdeen-Angus. Argentina and Uruguay cattle are reared under conditions somewhat peculiar to the locality. They are not range cattle nor yet exactly farm cattle, and but little or no grain is fed, yet the export steers of Buenos Aires or Montevideo are fully equal in size and will cut as much prime beef and as little waste as the best steers of Kansas, Pennsylvania or southwest Virginia.

In the central provinces of Buenos Aires, Cordoba, Santa Fe, Entre Rios and Corrientes the native grasses are better and more alfalfa is grown. These five are the principal cattle-producing provinces, as they are also the principal grain producers. Next to these come La Pampa, Santiago and Salta, each of which provinces carries from about 700,000 to 1,000,000 cattle. Then come San Luis, Mendoza, La Rioja and Catamarca, averaging about half of these numbers. In the north, Misiones, Formosa and El Chaco, and in the south Rio Negro and Chubut are rapidly becoming important cattle districts. Even San Juan and Neuquen, on the Andean slope, and Santa Cruz and Tierra del Fuego, in the extreme south, are finding that cattle as well as sheep can be raised with profit. In fact, there is but little territory in the Argentine Republic which is not suitable for either cattle or sheep.

Beef is exported from the La Plata region on the hoof, as salted or as meat extracts, and frozen in quarters.

England is the principal market for South American beef. The frozen-meat industry in the Argentine Republic has grown up since the closing of the English market to live cattle.

In the year 1908 the Argentine Republic exported 60,916 head of live beef cattle, three-fourths of which went to Chile. It exported 2,295,784 quarters (573,946 whole beeves) of frozen beef, and from the salting works 155,400 beeves as salt beef, meat extract or jerked beef.

In this latter industry Uruguay in addition exported 754,300 and southern Brazil 425,000 head, respectively.

As a field for investment in the cattle industry the La Plata region offers the very best of chances. In fact, it is without a rival, and will remain such until a like enterprise and capital which has there produced such marvelous results shall seek a new opportunity on the Oronoco and in the upper Amazon country.

The field for cattle growing is large; there need be no scarcity though the United States should cease to export and become an importer of meat.

No Corsets at West Point

Col. K. B. Collins, a retired army officer who was seen at the Raleigh, in discussing West Pointers said to a reporter of the Washington Herald: "I have often heard a question as to whether West Pointers wore corsets. It is absurd, in a way, because should any effeminate youngster resort to such a thing it would be an impossibility to keep the affair a secret, and, once known, his school life would become a burden to him on account of the endless amount of criticism he would receive from his fellows. He would be made the laughing stock of the school and would soon find himself the possessor of any number of effeminate nicknames that would grate upon his ears in any but a pleasant manner.

"It is true," continued the old soldier, "that many West Pointers acquire a figure the perfection of symmetry and a carriage the acme of manly grace, but these are due not to any ingenious appliance, but to the systematic drills and exercises that make every cadet, to a certain extent, an athlete. At the outset these young fellows are put through what are called the 'setting up' exercises, their object being to straighten the body and develop the chest. One might suppose that it would require a great amount of such exercise to make any marked showing, but three long hours of such exercise daily will soon produce beneficial results in the most stooped forms.

The cadet uniform is also a great help in this direction. The dress coat is tight, very tight. The shoulders are heavily padded in order to give them a square effect. The chest is made thick, so that there will be no danger of wrinkling. And in size, a new dress coat seems always to be designed for a boy several sizes smaller than the one who is to wear it. A new dress coat, in fact, is always a source of suffering to its owner. When he first puts it on, it buttons readily about the neck, but seems to lack about six inches at the waist. The owner may squirm and wriggle and attempt to reduce his waist to a minimum circumference, but his maiden efforts are never sufficient to button the new dress coat. Experience is a great teacher, though, and the young fellow laughingly requests one or two friends to lend their assistance, and with their combined tugging and squeezing he finally succeeds in buttoning the coat. All this for the sake of looks; comfort has no place in the makeup of a West Pointer; it is discipline and looks."

The "Done Up" Shirt Waist.

Half the looks of a shirt waist depend on the way it is done up. If it is washed with cheap strong yellow soap, so that it gets streaked and stained instead of being cleaned and beautified, it is "done up" sure enough. The woman who values her personal appearance—and that means every woman—will see to it that her shirt waists are laundered with a soap that leaves them white and clean and sweet and new-looking. Easy Task soap is the only one that will do this. Same price as others—five cents a cake, and the greatest enemy to dirt and friend to fabrics ever made.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 25, 1910.

FOR CONGRESS.

To the voters of the 6th Congressional District:

I desire to announce my candidacy for the Republican nomination for Congress at the forthcoming primaries, which will be held on August 30th. I will appreciate the active support of all Republicans.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR.,
Kensington, Md.

I hereby announce my candidacy for Congress from the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, subject to the decision of the Republican primaries to be held on August 30th.

ALEXANDER R. HAGNER,
Hagerstown.

MR. ALEX. R. HAGNER FOR CONGRESS.

There should be but one purpose uppermost in the minds of all Republicans in the Sixth Maryland District at the coming primaries on August 30th, viz: to select a candidate for Congress that can be elected and who will take his seat in the House of Representatives if elected. The withdrawal of Col. George A. Pearre from the race now leaves but three candidates in the field. They are Alex. R. Hagner, of Washington county, Gist Blair and B. H. Warner, Jr., of Montgomery county. Montgomery county is the only Democratic county in this Congressional District and is now filled to overflowing with all kinds of office holders. Nearly every citizen residing in the small towns around the District of Columbia and in Montgomery county is an office holder, and the Republicans in the four great Republican counties, to wit: Allegany, Garrett, Washington and Frederick, are asked to give up their rights to Montgomery county also with regard to the Congressman. Is this fair or good Republican politics? Certainly not. Where must Blair and Warner get their Republican majorities? Why in the four counties named above. There are but 2,800 or 3,000 Republican voters in Montgomery county. To think of the great intelligent electorate of Allegany, Garrett, Washington and Frederick counties being compelled to submit to the selection of a candidate from a county which is Democratic. This is unfair to the Republicans of the Sixth District.

Now that Col. Pearre has withdrawn but one logical candidate remains in the field and that one is Mr. Alex. R. Hagner, of Hagerstown. He has worked hard for years in the party while both Blair and Warner have just begun, so to speak, to labor in the cause. Mr. Blair is the son of Montgomery Blair who ran on the Democratic ticket against the the Hon. Louis L. McComas in the eighties and was defeated. Mr. Warner is a young man with plenty of time before him to get to Congress later. Mr. Hagner is nearing the fifty year mark; a man of mature thought and good judgment, who will, if nominated, satisfy every element of the party and be elected by a large majority.

Don't fail, Republicans, to come to the primaries on the 30th inst., and cast your votes for Alex. R. Hagner for Congress.

FOREST FIRE HAVOC.

Scores of lives have been lost in the forest fires that have devastated the regions of the Northwest. The sweep of flames over many miles of timber land calling for the most earnest efforts of the firefighters, with the assistance of federal troops, has brought consternation to many small towns and timber camps. Numerous acts of unrecorded heroism have been performed by men at war with the most destructive of natural forces. The prevalence of high winds working against them made the fight desperate. Except for the forest patrol, along with the bands of settlers in the affected regions and the soldiers from nearby posts, the havoc would have been appalling and the loss of life tremendous. The fact that a place shut in by blazing forests, like Wallace, Idaho, was not entirely consumed and its inhabitants rendered up to the flames in a terrible holocaust, is due to the bravery of the firefighters. Much the same can be said of other towns. Still, the loss of life has been almost unparalleled from such a cause in recent times.

The destruction of millions of dollars' worth of timberland, of vast values in cut timber, and the wiping out of many truck gardens is the outcome of the fires. Prior to the establishment of the forest reserves public interest would not have been engaged with the material bearings of the fire as much as with its spectacular effects. The public has come to know, however, that such fires are a serious subtraction from the total wealth of the country, that the destruction is of a form of wealth that requires slow accretion to replace. The scouts of the forestry service, who patrol the reserve—pitifully few for the work required of them—do an inestimable good in quenching forest fires at the origin before they get headway. But occasionally tremendous leeway is gained by the flames. This will be the case until the reservations of this government are as carefully and adequately patrolled as those of the German government, where extensive forest fires could not occur. The lesson of this fire is the lesson of the bad results of parsimony in the protection of the virgin forests set aside for the use of the people.

The stories from the far Northwest are full of thrilling interest, the keen human interest centering in life, death and succor from perils. Few chapters of pioneer recitals of other days are as vivid as those that tell of the great forest fires in the northwestern group of states and the manly deeds of the men who have desperately fought them.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY REPUBLICANS

Indorse Gist Blair for Congressional Nomination.

At a meeting of Republican leaders held in Rockville on Saturday, August 20, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"We, the representatives of the Republican party in the county of Montgomery and the state of Maryland, reasserting our loyalty to the Republican party and its platform and desiring to promote the achievement of its high aims irrespective of the claims or personal ambition of any candidate, do hereby, in an advisory capacity, express to the voters of the county our views as to the best available candidate to represent the Republican party in the Sixth Congressional District, to be voted for at the primaries to be held August 30 at the usual voting places.

"Resolved, that Hon. Gist Blair, of Silver Spring, Montgomery county, is the best available candidate of the party to represent our county and the congressional district, and has every legal and moral right to represent us.

"Mr. Blair is a lawyer of recognized ability and is in the prime of life. He is a son of the late Montgomery Blair, of Silver Spring, Lincoln's Postmaster General.

"He is the owner of and taxpayer on large real estate interests at Silver Spring, where he resides and pays his personal tax as a resident.

"He is one of the Montgomery county people, a patron and supporter of its local enterprises and a generous contributor to the legitimate expenses of the party organization.

"He has ably represented the Republican party in active executive services and is justly entitled to recognition for the more important post of representing us in Congress.

"The great Republican party has never needed representatives in Congress more than now, and to name any man who could not be elected would be equivalent to making the personal ambition of the individual paramount to the best interests of the party.

"Believing that Mr. Blair may be elected, if nominated, we pledge him our hearty support at the primaries on August 30 and urgently recommend all good Republicans to do the same.

GAS ENGINE IN OPERATION

Electric Light Station Equipped With New Machine.

The new 125-horse power gas engine which was recently installed in the Oakland Electric Light Company's power house here was given a try out on Saturday night with a load approximately one hundred and ten horse power. The massive machine had no trouble whatever in handling its load and its performance was entirely satisfactory.

The engine, from a mechanical viewpoint, is a beauty. It is a double cylinder machine and the crank shafts and all other working parts, with the exception of the oil pump and ignition rods, are encased in a heavy sheathing of cast iron. The exhaust from the engine is first led into a concrete well and from thence a vent made of steel piping leads the used gas above the roof of the building. The noise of the exhaust is hardly preceptible.

From an economical standpoint in the matter of fuel and oil quite a saving is being made by the owner of the electric plant.

Sane Advice to Girls.

Marcel Boulanger, a noted French writer, gives this sane advice to girls: Remember, girls, that your faces really matter little or nothing. To preserve for a long time the illusion that you are as fresh as the morning and to show off dress to the best advantage, you must study your bodies above everything else and become mistress of the art of movement and charm. Never allow yourself to become 'slack.' Carry yourselves well, keep in good health and keep your minds keen. And, above all, don't become round shouldered and crooked by constantly sitting in one position for hours playing bridge. Take plenty of fresh air and exercise and live as life ought to be lived."

The Dutch Collar.

At last the throat of the woman beautiful is to be seen.

Nothing so inartistic as the high collar has had its vogue in woman's dress in the last decade, and it is a pleasure to sound its knell.

The sensible woman will begin immediately to give attention to her throat and neck; even the masseuse in the shop is apt to neglect this important adjunct to the pulchritude of her patron, unless she is reminded that this year all women's necks will be on view. Of course, every one of them will want to show a white, round throat, guiltless of wrinkles or too much fat, for remember the Dutch collar has come to stay.—Illustrated Sunday Magazine.

Uncle Eben's Philosophy.

"I knows a man," says Uncle Eben, "dat says he loves nature. But he never goes out in de woods wifout a shotgun. Dat's de way some folks loves deir neighbors."

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night, she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. She passed a terrible night, which was filled with unseemly noises. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff button in a clothes hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot. A strange man was found shot to death, in the hall. It proved to be the body of Arnold Armstrong, whose banker father owned the country house. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson and the coroner arrived. Gertrude revealed that she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she had talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson told Miss Innes that she was hiding evidence from him. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. It developed that the intruder was probably a woman. Gertrude was suspected, for the intruder left a print of a bare foot. Gertrude returned home with her right ankle sprained. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff button. Halsey suddenly reappeared. He said he and Bailey had left because they had received a telegram. Gertrude said that she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him Halsey's loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested, charged with embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong had wrecked his own bank, and was able to clear Bailey. A telegram contained news that Paul Armstrong was dead. Halsey trapped Mrs. Watson, the housekeeper, while she was stealing from the house.

CHAPTER XII.—Continued.

"I reckon you bettah come in Mis' Innes," he said, speaking cautiously. "It's got so I dunno what to do, and it's boun' to come out some time er ruther."

He threw the door open then, and I stepped inside, Halsey close behind. In the sitting room the old negro turned with quiet dignity to Halsey.

"You bettah sit down, sah," he said. "It's a place for a woman, sah."

Things were not turning out the way Halsey expected. He sat down on the center-table, with his hands thrust in his pockets, and watched me as I followed Thomas up the narrow stairs. At the top a woman was standing, and a second glance showed me it was Rosie. She shrank back a little, but I said nothing. And then Thomas motioned to a partly open door, and I went in.

The lodge boasted of three bedrooms upstairs, all comfortably furnished. In this one, the largest and airiest, a night lamp was burning, and by its light I could make out a plain white metal bed. A girl was asleep there—or in a half stupor, for she muttered something now and then. Rosie had taken her courage in her hands, and coming in had turned up the light. It was only then that I knew. Fever-flushed, ill as she was, I recognized Louise Armstrong.

I stood gazing down at her in a stupor of amazement. Louise here, hiding at the lodge, ill and alone! Rosie came up to the bed and smoothed the white counterpane.

"I am afraid she is worse to-night," she ventured at last. I put my hand on the sick girl's forehead. It was burning with fever, and I turned to where Thomas lingered in the hallway.

"Will you tell me what you mean, Thomas Johnson, by not telling me this before?" I demanded indignantly.

Thomas quailed.

"Mis' Louise wouldn't let me," he said earnestly. "I wanted to. She ought to 'a' had a doctor the night she came, but she wouldn' hear to it. Is she very bad, Mis' Innes?"

"Bad enough," I said coldly. "Send Mr. Innes up."

Halsey came up the stairs slowly, looking rather interested and inclined to be amused. For a moment he could not see anything distinctly in the darkened room; he stopped, glanced at Rosie and at me, and then his eyes fell on the restless head on the pillow. I think he felt who it was before he really saw her; he crossed the room in a couple of strides and bent over the bed.

"Louise!" he said softly; but she did not reply, and her eyes showed no recognition. Halsey was young, and illness was new to him. He straightened himself slowly, still watching her, and caught my arm.

"She's dying, Aunt Ray!" he said huskily. "Dying! Why, she doesn't know me!"

"Fudge!" I snapped, being apt to grow irritable when my sympathies are aroused. "She's doing nothing of the sort—and don't pinch my arm. If you want something to do, go and choke Thomas."

But at that moment Louise roused from her stupor to cough, and at the end of the paroxysm, as Rosie laid her back, exhausted, she knew us. That was all Halsey wanted; to him consciousness was recovery. He dropped on his knees beside the bed, and tried to tell her she was all right, and we would bring her around in a hurry, and how beautiful she looked—only to break down utterly and have to stop. And at that I came to my senses, and put him out.

"This instant!" I ordered, as he hesitated. "And send Rosie here."

He did not go far. He sat on the top step of the stairs, only leaving to telephone for a doctor, and getting in everybody's way in his eagerness to fetch and carry. I got him away finally, by sending him to fix up the car as a sort of ambulance, in case the doctor would allow the sick girl to be moved. He sent Gertrude down to the lodge loaded with all manner of impossible things, including an armful of Turkish towels and a box of mustard plasters, and as the two girls had known each other somewhat before, Louise brightened perceptibly when she saw Gertrude.

When the doctor from Englewood—the Casanova doctor, Dr. Walker, being away—had started for Sunnyside, and I had got Thomas to stop trying to explain what he did not understand himself, I had a long talk with the old man, and this is what I learned.

On Saturday evening before, about ten o'clock, he had been reading in the sitting room downstairs, when some one rapped at the door. The old man was alone, Warner not having arrived, and at first he was uncertain about opening the door. He did so finally, and was amazed at being confronted by Louise Armstrong. Thomas was an old family servant, having been with the present Mrs. Armstrong since she was a child, and he was overwhelmed at seeing Louise. He saw that she was excited and tired, and he drew her into the sitting room and made her sit down. After a while he went to the house and brought Mrs. Watson, and they talked until late. The old man said Louise was in trouble, and seemed frightened. Mrs. Watson made some tea and took it to the lodge, but Louise made them both promise to keep her presence a secret. She had not known that Sunnyside was rented, and whatever her trouble was, this complicated things. She seemed puzzled. Her stepfather and her mother were still in California—that was all she would say about them. Why she had run away no one could imagine. Mr. Arnold Armstrong was at the Greenwood club, and at last Thomas, not knowing what else to do, went over there along the path. It was almost midnight. Part way over he met Armstrong himself and brought him to the lodge. Mrs. Watson had gone to the house for some bed linen, it having been arranged that under the circumstances Louise would be better at the lodge until morning. Arnold Armstrong and Louise had a long conference, during which he was heard to storm and become very violent. When he left it was after two. He had gone up to the house—Thomas did not know why—and at three o'clock he was shot at the foot of the circular staircase.

Amazed at Being Confron

The following morning Louise had been ill. She had asked for Arnold, and was told he had left town. Thomas had not the moral courage to tell her of the crime. She refused a doctor, and shrank morbidly from having her presence known. Mrs. Watson and Thomas had had their hands full, and at last Rosie had been enlisted to help them. She carried necessary provisions — little enough — to the lodge, and helped to keep the secret.

Thomas told me quite frankly that he had been anxious to keep Louise's presence hidden for this reason: They had all seen Arnold Armstrong that night, and he, himself, for one, was known to have had no very friendly feeling for the dead man. As to the reason for Louise's flight from California, or why she had not gone to the Fitzhughs', or to some of her people in town, he had no more information that I had. With the death of her stepfather and the prospect of the immediate return of the family, things had become more and more impossible. I gathered that Thomas was as relieved as I at the turn events had taken. No, she did not know of either of the deaths in the family.

Taken all around, I had only substituted one mystery for another. If I knew now why Rosie had taken the basket of dishes, I did not know who had spoken to her and followed her along the drive. If I knew that Louise was in the lodge, I did not know why she was there. If I knew that Arnold Armstrong had spent some time in the lodge the night before he was murdered, I was no nearer the solution of the crime. Who was the midnight intruder who had so alarmed Liddy and myself? Who had fallen down the clothes chute? Was Gertrude's lover a villain or a victim? Time was to answer all these things.

CHAPTER XIII.

Louise.

The doctor from Englewood came very soon, and I went up to see the sick girl with him. Halsey had gone to supervise the fitting of the car with blankets and pillows, and Gertrude was opening and airing Louise's own rooms at the house. Her private sitting room, bedroom and dressing room were as they had been when we came. They occupied the end of the east wing, beyond the circular staircase, and we had not even opened them.

The girl herself was too ill to notice what was being done. When, with the help of the doctor, who was a fa-

Old Ladies' home and ruins their digestion by sending them ice cream and cake on every holiday. Beyond that, and her reputation at bridge, which is insufferably bad—she is the worst player at the bridge club—I know little of her. It was she who had taken charge of Arnold Armstrong's funeral, however, and I went at once to the telephone.

"Yes," I said, "this is Miss Innes."

"Miss Innes," she said volubly, "I have just received a very strange telegram from my cousin, Mrs. Armstrong. Her husband died yesterday in California and—wait, I will read you the message."

I knew what was coming, and I made up my mind at once. If Louise Armstrong had a good and sufficient reason for leaving her people and coming home, a reason, moreover, that kept her from going at once to Mrs. Ogden Fitghugh, and brought her to the lodge at Sunnyside instead, it was not my intention to betray her. Louise herself must notify her people. I do not justify myself now, but remember, I was in a peculiar position toward the Armstrong family. I was connected most unpleasantly with a cold-blooded crime, and my niece and nephew were practically beggared, either directly or indirectly, through the head of the family.

Mrs. Fitzhugh had found the massage.

"'Paul died yesterday. Heart disease,'" she read. "'Wire at once if Louise is with you.' You see, Miss Innes, Louise must have started east, and Fanny is alarmed about her."

"Yes," I said.

"Louise is not here," Mrs. Fitzhugh went on, "and none of her friends—the few who are still in town—have seen her. I called you because Sunnyside was not rented when she went away, and Louise might have gone there."

"I am sorry, Mrs. Fitzhugh, but I cannot help you," I said, and was immediately filled with compunction. Suppose Louise grew worse? Who was I to play Providence in this case? The anxious mother certainly had a right to know that her daughter was in good hands. So I broke in on Mrs. Fitzhugh's voluble excuses for disturbing me.

"Mrs. Fitzhugh," I said. "I was going to let you think I knew nothing about Louise Armstrong, but I have changed my mind. Louise is here, with me." There was a clatter of ejaculations at the other end of the wire. "She is ill, and not able to be moved. Moreover, she is unable to see any one. I wish you would wire her mother that she is with me, and tell her not to worry. No, I do not know why she came east."

"But my dear Miss Innes!" Mrs. Fitzhugh began. I cut in ruthlessly.

"I will send for you as soon as she can see you," I said. "No, she is not in a critical state now, but the doctor says she must have absolute quiet.

When I had hung up the receiver, I sat down to think. So Louise had fled from her people in California, and had come east alone! It occurred to me that Dr. Walker might be concerned in it, might possibly have bothered her with unwelcome attentions; but it seemed to me that Louise was hardly a girl to take refuge in flight under such circumstances. She had always been high-spirited, with the well-poised head and buoyant step of the outdoors girl. It must have been much more in keeping with Louise's character, as I knew it, to resent vigorously any unwelcome attentions from Dr. Walker. It was the suitor whom I should have expected to see in headlong flight, not the lady in the case.

The puzzle was no clearer at the end of the half hour. I picked up the morning papers, which were still full of the looting of the Traders' bank, the interest at fever height again, on account of Paul Armstrong's death. The bank examiners were working on the books, and said nothing for publication; John Bailey had been released on bond. The body of Paul Armstrong would arrive Sunday and would be buried from the Armstrong town house. There were rumors that the dead man's estate had been a comparatively small one. The last paragraph was the important one.

Walter P. Broadhurst of the Marine bank had produced 200 American Traction bonds, which had been placed as security with the Marine bank for a loan of $160,000, made to Paul Armstrong, just before his California trip. The bonds were a part of the missing traction bonds from the Traders' bank! While this involved the late president of the wrecked bank, to my mind it by no means cleared its cashier.

For Needs of Humanity

By B. L. Palmer, Layman
Houston, Texas

No movement of any character has ever attained great proportions or held an important place in the history of human activities unless it was founded upon the needs of humanity and had for its objective the improvement of conditions under which mankind lives.

Some of these movements have been along the lines of scientific research, and had for their purpose the gaining of greater knowledge, by which the human race should be benefited. Some have been political movements to give to mankind a more perfect system of government. From the days of Martin Luther down to the present time there have been various movements of a religious nature which have had for their purpose the correction of improper conditions and the raising of mankind to a higher plane of spiritual life. But whatever has been the character of the movement, each one which has attained success has been founded upon some human need, and has been successful only in the measure in which it satisfied that need. The laymen's missionary movement is destined to be successful and to occupy a prominent place in the history of the church because its only purpose is to supply a human need, and because it has adopted proper methods for accomplishing its purpose.

The work of the laymen's movement is not revolutionary in its nature.

We do not propose to do a new work, but to take a new hold upon the old task and do it right.

Perhaps you think the work of the church has been well done all the time, but if you think thus, it is because you are uninformed, and the first work which the laymen's movement purposes to do is to inform you.

We are at present engaged in a great campaign of education throughout the whole land.

It is our purpose to give to every man in the church a thorough knowledge of conditions.

We confidently believe that information is the only thing wherein the church is lacking.

We believe that churchmen have the love of Christ in their hearts, and the desire, the intelligence, the energy and the means to do the work which Christ began.

For he only began the work—no more—and then as a sublime evidence of his faith in his followers. He intrusted the completion of the task for which he gave his life to frail humanity.

When Christ's work ended man's work began.

From time immemorial, mission work has been left to the preachers and the women.

The men of the church have felt that their full duty was done when they had contributed to the support of their local church, and perhaps shared in the administration of its temporal affairs. The laymen's movement exists today for the sole purpose of disillusioning men—of awakening them and arousing them to a sense of their full duty as the sons of God.

We have been too prone to think of our duty to the unevangelized people of the world as a collective duty—the duty of the chruch as a body. If the world is to be evangelized within the present generation, it will be done only after we have come to realize that we have a personal duty and a personal responsibility in connection with the salvation of mankind.

But you ask, how can I apply my individual efforts to the work? You may study, pray, give and serve.

Study that you may know the need, pray that God may bless your efforts. The efforts of others to supply the need, give that those who are devoting their lives to the work may have the means to carry it on, and serve in whatever place God may find for you to do a service, no matter how humble and unimportant it may seem.

Yes, you admit that you have not given much time to study and to prayer, but you assert that you have given to the support of missions for years. That's a fact. The statistics of the church show that we have been giving to missions, but how much have we given? The Protestant churches of America have in recent years given on an average the sum of 42 cents per member each year to this cause.

Forty-two cents! If you have given more than that, you have given more than the average.

Forty-two cents to carry salvation to those who dwell in darkness! And then we sing, "Will there be any stars in my crown?"

Brother, do you want a 40-cent star in your crown?

It is really surprising to note how many churchmen there are who devote themselves with great, energy to temporal affairs and yet cannot be induced to undertake even a small part of the Lord's work.

Can it be that there is such a thing as a spiritual hook-worm? If there is, the men of our chruches "have it bad."

The unmistakable symptom of the hook-worm, I am told, is "an aptitude for continuous resting."

The only strong people are those who work, and it is only work that gives courage and faith.—Emile Zola.

LEADING MISTAKES IN LIFE

Writer Has Recorded Ten, of Which Most of Us Assuredly Have Our Share.

Some of us may be glad to be told that there are only ten life mistakes, for there seem to be so many more, but a recent writer has catalogued them. Perhaps these are only the ten leading ones from which the smaller errors arise. Let's look over the list and see how many of them are ours: First, to set up our own standard of right and wrong and judge people accordingly; second, to measure the enjoyment of others by our own; third, to expect uniformity of opinion in this world; fourth, to look for judgment and experience in youth; fifth, to endeavor to mold all dispositions alike; sixth, to look for perfection in our own actions; seventh, to worry ourselves and others with what cannot be remedied; eighth, to refuse to yield in immaterial matters; ninth, to refuse to alleviate, so far as it lies in our power, all which needs alleviation; tenth, to refuse to make allowance for the infirmities of others.

SKIN TROUBLES

A Healing Ointment With a Wide Range of Usefulness

A letter from Mrs. I. E. Cameron, Graduate Nurse, Augusta, Me., says: "I must write and tell you the good Resinol Ointment has done. I applied it to an ulcerated leg of six months' standing. Almost everything had been tried to heal it. Resinol was applied twice a day for four weeks, and the ulcers are entirely healed. It is now six months since the treatment and no indication of a return of the trouble. I have used Resinol for eruptions on children's faces, and for everything that seemed to need an ointment, with satisfactory results in every case."

Mrs. F. Cox, Chicago, Ill., says in another letter: "I cannot speak too highly of Resinol Ointment and Soap. They cured my baby boy of Eczema. He had a very severe case. Numerous other remedies had been tried and failed to do any good. I would not be without them in the house."

The first application will relieve the itching and irritation in skin diseases, and stop the pain in burns or scalds. Chafing, Sunburn, Poison Ivy eruptions are often cured by an overnight application.

Resinol Ointment, Resinol Soap and Resinol Medicated Shaving Stick are sold at all Drug Stores.

EPIDEMIC OF ITCH IN WELSH VILLAGE

"In Dowlais, South Wales, about fifteen years ago, families were stricken wholesale by a disease known as the itch. Believe me, it is the most terrible disease of its kind that I know of, as it itches all through your body and makes your life an inferno. Sleep is out of the question and you feel as if a million mosquitoes were attacking you at the same time. I knew a dozen families that were so affected.

"The doctors did their best, but their remedies were of no avail whatever. Then the families tried a druggist who was noted far and wide for his remarkable cures. People came to him from all parts of the country for treatment, but his medicine made matters still worse, as a last resort they were advised by a friend to use the Cuticura Remedies. I am glad to tell you that after a few days' treatment with Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Resolvent, the effect was wonderful and the result was a perfect cure in all cases.

"I may add that my three brothers, three sisters, myself and all our families have been users of the Cuticura Remedies for fifteen years. Thomas Hugh, 1650 West Huron St., Chicago, Ill., June 29, 1909."

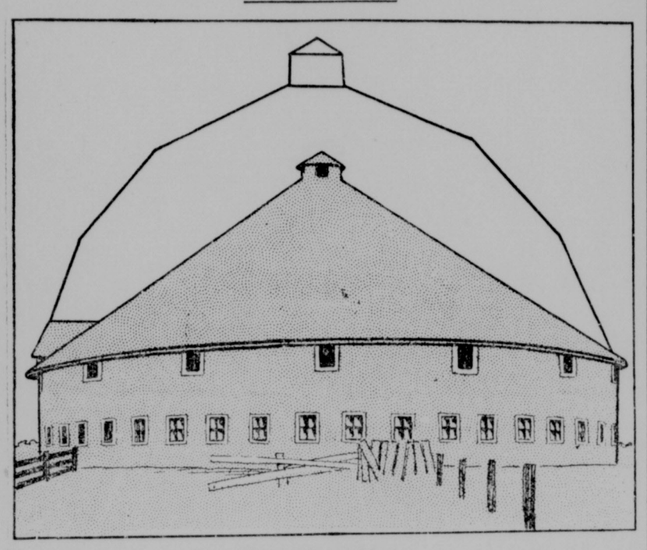
STRENGTH AND CHEAPNESS OF ROUND DAIRY BARN

Several Points of Superiority Over Rectangular Formed Structure Have Never Been Fully Considered.



Round Dairy Barn.

In the early days when lumber was cheap, buildings were built of logs, or at least had heavy frames. Under these conditions the rectangular barn was the one naturally used, and people have followed in the footsteps of their forefathers in continuing this form of barn. The result is that the economy and advantages of the round barn have apparently never been considered. This is because they are not obvious at first sight, and become fully apparent only after a detailed study of the construction. For these reasons, the rectangular form still continues to be built, although it requires much more lumber. As the price of lumber has advanced so materially in recent years, the possible saving in this material is a large item, and well worth investigating.

The difficulty with most round barns that have been built, thus far, is that they do not have a self-supporting roof, and consequently lost many of the advantages of a properly constructed round barn. This is the principal reason why round barns have not become more popular. A straight roof necessarily requires many supports in the barn below. These are both costly and inconvenient, and make the roof no stronger than a dome-shaped, self-supporting roof which nearly doubles the capacity of the mow.

Many who have thus disregarded capacity have also wasted lumber and made a needless amount of work by chopping or hewing out the sill and plate, thus requiring more labor and lumber, besides sacrificing the greater strength of a built-up sill.

Another reason for the scarcity of round barns is the difficulty in getting them built. Most carpenters hesitate to undertake the work because in the erection of a round barn the construction should be entirely different from that of the rectangular form. Many new problems present themselves, but when these are once understood, the round barn offers no more difficulties in construction than the rectangular form.

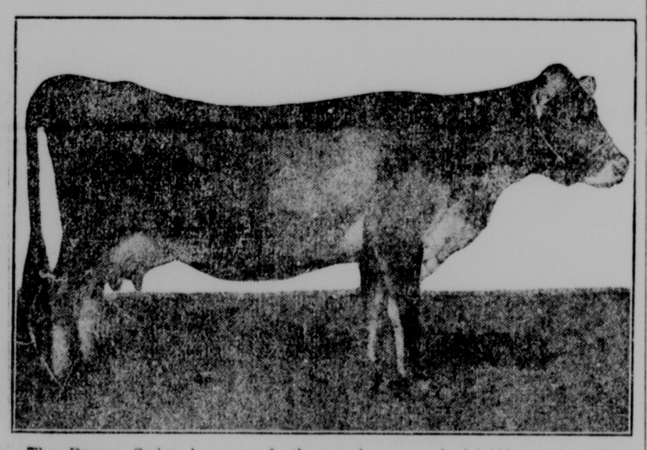
The first thing to consider in the erection of a barn is a convenient arrangement for the purpose for which it is to be used.

Considering that the barn on a dairy farm is used twice every day in the year, and that for six months each year the cows occupy it almost continuously, and that during this time a large amount of the labor of the farm is done inside the barn, it is evident that the question of its convenience is a vital one.

The circular construction is the strongest, because it takes advantage of the lineal, instead of the breaking strength of the lumber. Each row of boards running around the barn forms a hoop that holds the barn together. A barrel, properly hooped and headed, is almost indestructible, and much stronger than a box, although the hoops are small. This strength is because the stress comes on the hoops in a lineal direction. Any piece of timber is many times stronger on a lineal pull than on a breaking stress.

All exposed surfaces of round barns are circular, as both the sides and roof are arched, which is the strongest form of construction to resist wind pressure; besides, the wind in striking it, glances off and can get no direct hold on the walls or roof, as it can on the flat sides or gable ends of a rectangular structure. If the lumber is properly placed in a round barn, much of it will perform two or more functions. Every row of siding boards running around the building serves also as a brace, and the same is true of the roof boards and the arched rafters. If the siding is put on vertically and the roof built dome shaped, no scaffolding is required inside or out. These are points of great economy in the round construction.

EXCELLENT BROWN SWISS COW



The Brown Swiss is one of the standard breeds from Switzerland. It has become generally distributed throughout Europe and was first imported into the United States in 1869. Brown Swiss cattle are well adapted to conditions when a combination of dairy and beef production is sought, says Orange Judd Farmer. The size is medium; cows weigh 1,200 to 1,300 pounds. The quantity of milk is moderately large and the fat content good. According to the American standard, the color is dark to light brown, or some seasons of the year gray. The attractive cow, here shown, Folie 1552, was bred in New York and made a record of 4,403 pounds milk in 120 days.

Sowing Late Cabbage.

It is time to sow late cabbage in all sections. See that the seed bed is fine and moist. Cover seed with not less than three-fourths of an inch of soil and do not sow too thickly. Thin sowings encourage the growth of strong, stalky plants which stand transplanting better than spindling plants.

Always pick vegetables for the market before they are fully matured, as they are then more apt to ripen at the proper time for the user.

For High Occasions

BY JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

A GROUP of handsomely gowned women, dressed for a social function requiring their best efforts, shows the more or less beautiful effects which have been brought about in draped skirts. Fashion has turned a smiling face to this innovation; it is welcomed more for its possibilities than for its accomplishments. It must be confessed that a "built to order" figure and natural grace of carriage are required to redeem some of the models from clumsiness, but given slenderness and grace in the wearer, costumers have turned out a few unforgetable models, with touches of beauty not to be achieved, except by the employment of draped effects. One of these was brought out in the gown made for a maid of honor in a wedding in what we are pleased to call high life. This gown, of marquisette, over voile, which in turn was posed over messaline, showed the marquisette turned up about the bottom of the drapery, providing a nestling place for a long band of roses which were held by it as one holds an apron full of roses. The panier drapery, which was heralded with much noise—mostly of alarm—failed to be accepted except in a form so modified that its identity was lost. A trace of it is seen in the figure at the left of the group.

The drapery which has met with most success falls in straight lines nearly to the foot of the skirt where it is confined in various ways. Sometimes a band of embroidery gathers it in; sometimes it is gathered into several points and fastened to the skirt with ornaments, or buckles. Most often it falls free in front and is gathered to a point at the back where it is confined by a buckle made of the same material as the dress.

The center figure shows a gown embodying the best liked of the season's new features. This is the inlay of a plain broad band of lace of silk on the material. The top edge is shaped usually in slanting lines, but many gowns are finished with plain broad bands of material, heavier than that employed in the body of the dress.

Embroidery in rich and varied colors is introduced in nearly all gowns for state occasions. Bits of Persian and other Oriental designs in silk add to the appearance of intricate designing in these costumes. As a result gowns are brilliant.

Chiffon coats in long, clinging lines are worn over these sparkling creations. The effect is very fine and emphasizes once more the liking for Oriental splendor in the use of colors. We are borrowing ideas from all over the world, making them our own. And in turn we are impressing the rest of the world with ideas of our own.

STRIPED LINEN DRESS.

There is no smarter design for a young girl's dress than this; our model is in blue striped linen with trimming of plain lining of the darker shade of stripes. The panel back and front of the princess part are put on in wrapped seams; the lower half of skirt is arranged in well folded box-plaits, headed by a fish-wife trimming

White Belts.

The white washable belts for wear with trim shirtwaist suits of white goods are exceedingly attractive, while the prices at which they are marked are cheap.

The smartest of these belts close with small round or oval white pearl buckles, which can be removed when laundering.

Imagine a white duck belt so fitted, one and one-half inches wide, at 40 cents, and a pretty white mercerized embroidered jacquard belt a little wider at 18 cents.

Twenty-five cents will buy a white linen all-over embroidered belt, stitched edge and lined, and 35 cents the same design in a better quality.

Sane Advice to Girls.

Marcel Boulanger, a noted French writer, gives this sane advice to girls: "Remember, girls, that your faces really matter little or nothing. To preserve for a long time the illusion that you are as fresh as the morning and to show off dress to the best advantage, you must study your bodies above everything else and become mistress of the art of movement and charm. Never allow yourself to become 'slack.' carry yourselves well, keep in good health and keep your minds keen. And, above all, don't become round shouldered and crooked by constantly sitting in one position for hours playing bridge. Take plenty of fresh air and exercise and live as life ought to be lived."

The Dutch Collar.

At last the throat of the woman beautiful is to be seen.

Nothing so inartistic as the high collar has had its vogue in woman's dress in the last decade, and it is a pleasure to sound its knell.

The sensible woman will begin immediately to give attention to her throat and neck; even the masseuse in the shop is apt to neglect this important adjunct to the pulchritude of her patron, unless she is reminded that this year all women's necks will be on view. Of course, every one of them will want to show a white, round throat, guiltless of wrinkles or too much fat, for remember the Dutch collar has come to stay.—Illustrated Sunday Magazine.

Immense Saving Possible.

In a preliminary bulletin on the cost of maintaining a tuberculosis sanatorium, the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis announces that the average cost per patient per day in thirty semi-charitable sanatoria scattered in all parts of the United States is $1.669. These institutions represent an annual expenditure of over $1,300,000 and over $15,000 days of treatment given each year. The bulletin, which is part of an extensive study the National association is making for its bureau of information, points out that the country could save annually at least $150,000,000 if the indigent consumptives were properly segregated.

More Serious.

"Mathilde Browne was very rude to an overdressed old woman she met on the street the other day."

"I know the story. The old woman turned out to be Mathilde's very rich aunt, and now she's going to give all her money to a hospital for decrepit dogs."

"Nothing of the sort. In fact, it's worse. The old woman was the Brownes' new cook—and now they haven't any."

Can You Save?

Certainly you can save, if there is an incentive. Lots of women in Columbus are saving wrappers from Easy Task soap. You know if you send twenty-five of the wrappers and a two cent stamp to the Hewitt Brothers Soap Company, Dayton, Ohio, they will send you a beautiful art reproduction, all ready for framing. Some folks go to a picture store and pay a big, fat price for the same pictures. Your grocer keeps Easy Task soap; or he will keep it if you ask for it.

Qualified.

"How does your new book go?"

HIS WELCOME FOR PRODIGAL

Cowboy Would Have Reversed Proceedings as Recorded in the Scriptures.

Judge Ben B. Lindsey of the famous Denver juvenile court said in the course of a recent address in charity:

"Too many of us are inclined to think that, one misstep made, the boy is gone for good. Too many of us are like the cowboy.

"An itinerant preacher preached to a cowboy audience on the 'Prodigal Son.' He described the foolish prodigal's extravagance and dissipation; he described his penury and his husk-eating with the swine in the sty; he described his return, his father's loving welcome, the rejoicing, and the preparation of the fatted calf.

"The preacher in his discourse noticed a cowboy staring at him very hard. He thought he had made a convert, and addressing the cowboy personally, he said from the pulpit:

"'My dear friend, what would you have done if you had had a prodigal son returning home like that?'

"'Me!' said the cowboy, promptly and fiercely, 'I'd have shot the boy and raised the calf.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Religion Should Not Enter Into School Matter.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I will also show mine opinion, Job 25:17.
Wherefore I beseech you to hear me patiently, Acts 26:3.

Have the people of Oakland a grievance against the Board of Education? Should petitions from the public be slighted or disregarded? Should not the people choose all the school officers? If there is a grievance is it not against the Superintendent of the Board of Education? And is it against them as a body or as individuals? Or is there a defect in the statutes of the State? What under the sun has the churches to do with this matter? Have we not long fought against the unity of church and state?

The teachings of the Bible are so broad and the human individual mind so small and narrow that various people have started various doctrines, creeds and churches, according to their various beliefs. Various translations of the Scriptures have been made, according to men's interpretations, each of which claims to be the only true and legal church or teachings.

It is surprising to see with what tenacity the followers cling to their particular creed, and ignore any and all other Bible teachings that give credence to other creeds. All churches are doing a glorious work in the uplifting and saving of humanity. Enlightenment and civilization is indebted to all churches. He who believes to be good or to do good is to belong to some certain church or creed, and to be bad and to do bad is to belong to some other creed, not in harmony with his particular religion, is a one-eyed philosopher, and can see only that which he is willing to believe. Such we request not to read this article, whether Methodist, Catholic, Unitarian or what-not, for this article is for the broader minded.

No good was ever accomplished by arguments on technical theology. You may get the applause of the weaker of your own followers, but the broader minded people will condemn it. "Strive not with a man without cause, if he hath done thee no harm," Proverbs 3:30. "Hatred stirreth up strifes; but love covers all things," Proverbs 10:12. "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city." Proverbs 18:19. "It is an honor for a man to cease from strife," Proverbs 20:3. "For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work," James 3:16. "Now the end of the comm andment is charity out of the pure heart and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned, from which some have swerved, have turned aside into vain jangling; desiring to be teachers of the laws: understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm," 1 Tim. 1:5, 6; 7. "Thou makest us astrife unto our neighbors, and our enemies laugh among themselves," Psalms 80:6.

Since the days of the Apostles Christians have held a different opinion as to the meaning of Christ's teachings, and contention among His followers.

"Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greater," Luke 9:46. "I fear lest when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envying, wrath, strife, back-biting, whisperings, swellings, turmoil," 2 Cor. 12:20.

We again repeat that the church and the state shall have no connection. It has been the life work of many great and good men to bring the churches into such harmony one with another so that each sect or denomination of the Christian church looked upon the other as a co-worker in the Kingdom of God, each acknowledging the noble righteous work of the other, and all working for the salvation of humanity and the glory of God, rather than the overflow of churches. Greatest good has been accomplished by the broader and more liberal views, but it is with shame and humiliation that we compare the religious toleration at Oakland at the present time with that established by the Roman Catholic church in the founding of this glorious state. On April 2, 1649, the Maryland Assembly passed the following resolution:

"And whereas the inforcing of the conscience in matters of religion hath frequently fallen out to bee of dangerous consequence in thos commonwealths where it hath beene practiced, and for the more quiet and peaceable government of this province, and the better to preserve mutuall love and unity among the inhabitants here, Bee it, therefore, also by the lord proprietary, with the advice and assent of this assembly, ordained and enacted, * * * that no person or persons whatsoever within this province or the islands, ports, harbours, creeks, or havens thereunto belonging, professing to believe in Jesus Christ, shall from henceforth be any waies troubled, molested, or discountenanced, for or in respect of his or her religion, nor in the free exercise thereof within this province or the islands thereunto belonging, nor any way compelled to the beliefe or exercise of any other religion against his or her consent, so as they be not unfaithfull to the lord proprietary, or molest or conspire against the civill government, established or to be estabblished in this province under him or his heyres; and that all and every person or persons that shall presume contrary to this act and the true intent and meaning thereof, directly or indirectly, eyther in person or estate, willfully to wrong, disturbe, or trouble, or molest any person or persons whatsoever within this province, professing to believe in Jesus Christ, for or in respect of his or her religion, or the free exercise thereof within this province * * * shall be compelled to pay treble damages to the party so wronged or molested * * * "

It would appear that we have had very little progress in religious toleration in the last three hundred and fifty-nine years.

"And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbid him, because he followed not with us. And Jesus said unto him, forbid him not; for he that is not against us is for us," Luke 9:49, 50.

It seems to us that we can hear certain divines saying, "Master, we saw men preaching and teaching in thy name, and we forbid them because they follow not with us, nor the teachings of our church." "I am the Lord I change not," Malachi 3:6. Forbid them not.

We do not pretend to say that either party to this discussion is wrong in his creed or religion; we believe their religion is right according to their understanding of the Scriptures, for which they are only accountable to God. Is it not fair to accord the same privilege to people of other creeds? Has any one the right to say a man's religion is not right? To whom are we accountable for our belief, to the Methodist church, to the Catholic church, or to God?

"Judgment cometh from God," Prov. 29:26. "Judge not that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measures ye meet it shall be measured to you again," Matthew 7:1, 2.

The school is a matter of State, the Bible is a matter of Church, so let it remain; but you will never successfully teach the Bible in the state school until there is harmony of churches and versions of the Bible. This condition never has existed and probably never will, considering the progress we have made along this line in the last few hundred years. I should think not.

One subject touched on in this discussion is of some interest to the writer, and possibly to the public generally, and that is the early history of the Bible, particular during the first 500 years after Christ. Any authentic information along this line will be appreciated. The oldest dated manuscript the writer has any knowledge of is one in the British Museum dated A. D. 464, yet this is of the Old Testament. And it is not until many years later that I find anything bearing directly on the New Testament.

In conclusion I will say that I know of no Christian religion that will disqualify a man to fill any office, school, or otherwise in the United States' and the nearer he lives to his religion the better officer he is.

I know of thousands of men in all churches that are unfit to serve the public in any capacity; unfortunately these men seek and find our public offices, and it is through their corruption comes oppression, and not through any church or creed.

We all make mistakes, he who does not does nothing.

The Bittinger Picnic and Notes by the Way.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Riding from the Meadow Mountain church, in District No. 1, directly over the mountain on the road to Bittinger, the altered topography of that recently wild and unbroken region is surprising to a degree that baffles belief. In less than ten years, perhaps, this powerfully timbered part of Garrett, known as the Cunningham, Jennings and other extensive tracts, formerly growing some of the most choice white pine timber produced in this State, is today the picture of a tangled waste. Stumps, treetops with deeply rutted wagon roads, mill seats, saw dust and abandoned railways make a scene of desolation where but a few years back were great wooded areas in their native savagery and where the foot-fall of man was seldom heard. Continuing the long stretch depleted of its mighty products by the axman and the sawmill, the horseman enters suddenly a change of scene suggestive of an entirely new and different country beautified by trees and grasses belonging to another clime. Here flourishes the maple sugar tree to an approximation of perfection with an exhilarating relief to the eye and to the senses. These trees stand out grandly in striking features of dissimilarity among all their fellows of the forest, and with the green grasses and meandering streams over the levels they cover offer to the eye an oasis beyond the the border of a dreary land. Frequently their shapely trunks rise to fifty or more feet clear of a limb or twig. Their branches ladened with green leaves circle out from all sides with as much grace but less droop than the weeping willow, and so dense from the beginning to the crown as to exclude, in some cases, the common stem from which they spring. From now until their golden hues of autumn fade into the winter blight, this section, no less famous for its beauty than for the value of its sugar camps, is seen at its best. To such as have never looked upon these views, blending in lights and shadows, just as they come from nature's hand, a delight waits beggaring description. And, it appears, here Father Winter was less desolating with his frost than in other places as is shown by many well kept orchards yielding splendid apples for fall gathering. Hay is also good, in fact, much in advance of the average, while oats, corn, etc., on the carefully tilled farms of Mr. Perry Broadwater and others promise excellent returns.

Saturday, August 20th, was a festal day at Bittinger and will be long remembered by many so fortunate as to participate in its festivities. Good people of a wide community very generally joined with their Lutheran friends in a successful picnic and a happy "day off." Before the hour of 11 a. m. roads centering at the little town were alive with their tributes to the gathering throng, representatives from around Accident, Swanton, Grantsville and Bond; some in automobiles, buggies, double and single, and in wagons of the hay riding constructon, many graced by beautiful girls and well-dressed young men. Under huge trees were improvised tables filled with the best substantials that even this favored community can command, while on other tables were profusions of the delicacies of the season too tempting to think about and maintain self-control.

After an early dinner there was music from a skilfully played organ accompanied by several instruments and trained singers, with the selections interspersed by many recitations by bright pupils, both boys and girls. Two ministers with a like number of laymen were on hand to speak. After following closely all of the addresses except the closing one by the Rev. Mr. Young, it was too late to remain to hear that, we feel justified in saying that if the the addresses came up to mediocrity such praise would equal their merit, so far as we heard.

But may we venture an answer to an interrogation so frequently found in print:

"What is so rare as a day in June?"
Picnic speaking, without the "fried chicken" tune.

If in a distant and dim antiquity this tune ever possessed a note of music surely all that time down to date with its harrowing familiarity has left that note soundless and that we may now turn from the ashes of its annihilation to something fresher for the modern mind.

The day was cloudlessly beautiful; the ample shades under which we rested most grateful; the refreshments were bountiful; the music and recitations fell pleasingly on the ear, and good will and full happiness prevailed in all the proceedings. RELLIM.

TAFT DENIES TO WARNER.

New Turn In Sixth District Republican Congressional Fight.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23.—President Taft, in response to an inquiry by Brainard H. Warner, of Kensington, candidate for Congress from the Sixth Maryland district, has denied that he has taken part in the Republican primary fights in Maryland or elsewhere.

The statement, it was said, was made by Gist Blair, another candidate for Congress from the Sixth district, who had advertised throughout the district that the President brought him into the contest for the nomination. Mr. Warner telegraphed to President Taft for information as to the statement, and the President, by Secretary Norton, telegraphed in reply:

"Replying to your telegram of August 19, the President directs me to state that he has taken no part in primary fights in Maryland or elsewhere." Adv.-1t.

THREE BISHOPS TO BE AT THE PARK SUNDAY

Who Will Address a Morning Meeting in the Auditorium—Other Meetings.

Sunday at Mountain Lake Park will be full to overflowing for the church members and all others who may be there that day.

The Setting-Up Conference of the Missionary Movement, world-wide in its scope, will meet at the Park today and will continue until the 6th instant, when the leading laymen of the Methodist Epispocal church as well as three of the best known Bishops and three returned missionaries will be in conference every day.

Sunday, however, the meeting will be open to all when addresses in the morning will be made by Bishop James W. Bashford, of Peking, China; Bishop John E. Robinson, of Bombay, India, and Bishop Merriman C. Harris, of Seoul, Korea. These men will bring messages to their countrymen which will be well worth coming miles to hear. They will tell of conditions in the respective countries where they have been stationed and of the needs of the missionaries now in the field. The morning meeting will take place at half past ten o'clock in the auditorium.

The afternoon meeting at half past three will be addressed by three leading laymen and the evening meeting at 7.30 will be addressed by three returned missionaries.

In addition to the speaking excellent music by the Bible Conference chorus will be rendered. All who heard John P. Hillis and his great chorus at the Bible Conference will be delighted to learn that Mr. Hillis will be in charge of the music at this conference.

An invitation to every Garrett countian is extended to attend the meetings on Sunday.

Two Injured When Auto Turned Over

An automobile in which Mr. and Mrs. George W. Stamm, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Stamm and Mrs. Frank C. Hoffman of Wheeling, were riding turned over an embankment between Kingwood and Terra Alta Saturday morning and the women were thrown several feet. The Mesdames Stamm were slightly injured but Mrs. Hoffman escaped. The machine stopped to allow a wagon to pass and was resting on boards at the top of the bank. The men were out to crank up the machine when the boards gave way and the automobile went over. The women were thrown out when the machine turned over and it turned completely over again before landing in the ravine below, a total wreck. Mrs. Frank Stamm had her shoulders badly wrenched while Mrs. George Stamm was injured about the hips and chest.

SEPTEMBER FORECAST

As Predicted by Peter R. Smith, Our Weather Prognosticator.

A very high temperature will prevail at the opening of the month, attended by threatening conditions, which will pass off about the 3rd, leaving but slight traces of moisture. The 5th, 6th and 7th is a period denoting the passage of storms on transit. Threatening conditions will prevail on the above days, which will pass off in scattering clouds and wind storms, leaving the temperature much cooler.

A storm wave will be on transit on the 11th, 12th and 13th. The possibilities for rain will pass off in threatening clouds, wind and light showers in few and far between places.

A wave of weather disturbance will center on or touching the 16th, 17th and 18th. This storm wave may not leave its refreshing showers in all sections at this period. However, many localites will be blessed with showers of rain. Rain is denoted by rain-exciting causes coming to the front that will not reach all sections during the progress of the wave, which will materialize between the 18th and 26th of the month. The autumnal equinox is a strong rain factor, which is much strengthened by helping causes centering at dates, all of them near to the 22nd of the month.

The moon, as a helping factor at new and full moon, has wonderful power to unite these forces together. Full moon on the 18th and its declination is north, crossing the celestial equator on that date, which also adds to electrical action while on or near the celestial equator.

The rain wave will be general in the fall of rain at this period. Many intense rains will prevail at a number of places. Excessive winds will be experienced in many sections and the electrical displays intense. Also hail in many localities will show up.

After the passage of these storms, which may be continued to the 26th, the weather will become cooler and frost will show up in a number of places.

A return of storm conditions will prevail on the 28th, 29th and 30th. Rain and in the northern border states snow will make their entrance.

Played With Rattlesnake.

Hearing a loud rattle, Mrs. Oscar Lively, of Roseville, Grant county, W. Va., walked out in her yard and was horrified to see her two children, Hazel, aged 5, and Carl, aged 3 playing with a monstrous rattlesnake which was coiled up near the children and was swaying its head to and fro. The children were patting the snake on the head and strange to say the reptile made no effort to strike them.

Oiling Frederick's Streets.

Seven thousand gallons of oil are being used in Frederick for oiling the streets in order to keep down the dust.

WILL LEAD SIXTH DISTRICT REPUBLICANS TO VICTORY

Mr. Brainard H. Warner, Jr., of Montgomery County, the Successful Candidate at Tuesday's Election.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR.

With all the returns received Garrett county gives Blair 561, Hagner 73, and Warner 389. The Democratic vote was very sparse, not exceeding 225. The vote by districts follows:

	Blair	Hagner	Warner
Dist. No. 1	20	3	28
Dist. No. 2	69	6	59
Dist. No. 3	41	12	24
Dist. No. 4	48	8	5
Dist. No. 5	55	3	18
Dist. No. 6	49	0	35
Dist. No. 7	80	5	38
Dist. No. 8	18	6	19
Dist. No. 9	15	5	3
Dist. No. 10	40	6	37
Dist. No. 11	28	0	1
Dist. No. 12	30	7	8
Dist. No. 13	23	0	1
Dist. No. 14	54	12	115
	561	73	389

The above are the unofficial returns of the Republican primaries held in Garrett county on Tuesday.

While Mr. Blair carried Garrett, Allegany and Montgomery counties, Mr. Warner had a walk-over in Frederick and Mr. Hagner kept his home county—Washington—for himself. Mr. Warner was nominated by an estimated plurality over Mr. Blair of more than six hundred votes, Frederick county being the only one of the five counties comprising the Sixth District that gave Mr. Warner a majority, the figures from that county being upwards of 1400 over his competitors. The vote of Frederick is what placed Mr. Warner in the lead, Mr. Blair's majority outside of Frederick being about 700 over Warner.

The total vote cast at the primaries in this county was in the neighborhood of twelve hundred, for all five candidates. This is a little less than one third of the entire registered vote of the county.

There was a marked lack of interest in every district except Nos. 5 and 14 and even in these two districts a very small percentage of the vote was out. Workers in these two districts exerted every endeavor for their respective candidates and the result was that larger proportionate votes were polled than in any other two district of the county. One very plausible reason advanced for the lack of interest exhibited by the voters is that any one of the three candidates in the field would be acceptable to the people generally.

Many prominent party workers who opposed Mr. Warner's nomination have expressed themselves as being satisfied with the nominee and would do everything in their power to bring about his election. As one put it yesterday: "I am a Republican first and Mr. Warner shall have my hearty support, although he was not my choice at the primaries."

That Mr. Warner lost out in four of the counties is not regarded as a handicap. The party will unite for his election and give him a splendid majority in each of the five counties comprising the District.

Ex-State Senator David J. Lewis, of Cumberland, the Democratic nominee, is greatly pleased with the support he received at the hands of the Garrett county Democracy where he had a majority of nearly two hundred in a vote of a little more than 225.

The result in Montgomery was something of a surprise to the nominee, as Warner, while anticipating a very vigorous contest from his opponent, Mr. Blair, also a resident of Montgomery, expected to carry the county by a small majority. The vote resulted as follows: Blair, 1019; Warner, 871, and Hagner, 46. Lewis won by a small margin over his Democratic opponent, Etchison.

A tribute at the hands of his fellow Republicans of which he may well feel proud was bestowed upon Mr. Alexander Hagner in his home county which he carried with 986 votes, Blair receiving 662 and Warner 655. Mr. Hagner openly predicted that Washington county was safely in his column and the result of the primaries shows the accuracy of his estimate. Lewis made a runaway race for Etchison, defeating the latter almost three to one.

In Allegany county Mr. Blair's majority over Mr. Warner was 328.

GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE

Will Hold Their Second Annual Meeting at Mt. Lake Park.

The Inter-State Good Roads Association will meet in conference at Mt. Lake Park September 6, 7 and 8. The object of the association is to look after the betterment of the roads in Maryland, Ohio and West Virginia. Every phase of the road question will be discussed and many prominent road authorities will attend or address the meeting.

Addresses will be made by Hon. Logan W. Page, United States director of roads; Hon. Howard Sutherland, of Elkins; Mr. R. B. Naylor, of Wheeling, Walter Crosby, Hon. Geo. A. Pearre, Hon. Geo. C. Sturgiss, Mr. Baker, Hon. Chas. P. Light, Dr. J. F. Goucher, President Willard, of the B. & O. railroad, and Governers Austin L. Crothers and Wm. Glasscock.

The present officers of the association are: Dr. John F. Goucher, Baltimore, president; Hon. Howard Sutherland, Elkins, chairman; Dr. W. W. Davis, Mt. Lake Park, corresponding secretary.

ALL TO RESCUE FOR GOOD ROAD

Garrett County Appropriates and Farmers Donate Use of Teams.

Last Wednesday night at the Frostburg Opera House Manager Jos. Hitchins had thrown on the canvas a picture of the national pike such as appeared in the Daily News some weeks ago, but enlarged in size many times, showing up its frightful condition to perfection. The recent agitation for a betterment of this thoroughfare followed by a request of a few prominent farmers has prompted the commissioners of Garrett county to appropriate the sum of $150 to temporarily repair the worst places and endeavor to make them passable. The farmers are to cooperate by donating their teams, tools and services as far as possible when they have finished harvesting their crops. These people, tired of waiting, are compelled to take this course so as to protect life, limb and property but will not complain if the state road commission will take up the matter at their earliest convenience and give a few miles of good macadam road to this much neglected thoroughfare in the near future. Only a few days ago three prominent citizens of Frostburg were driving that way when they upset, not because of the speed they were trying to make, for speed is out of the question, but because of the many holes and rocky roughness. The work of this temporary repairing is to begin on Little Savage Mountain, just over the Allegany county line and as nothing can be expected this season in the way of a permanent improvement these men will do their best to make a good job which will last until the state commission gets busy. Their patience had nearly become exhausted but some substantial relief is expected before long. Many tons of coal must be hauled daily over these roads to the Consolidation Coal Company's pumping engines and for other purposes which is a slow process. This action of the farmers in offering their assistance is very commendable and since they are also taxpayers they should receive some consideration which shall repay them many times for their trouble.—Cumberland News.

Senator Davis Very Well.

If any further denial of the serious illess of Senator Davis were needed it was forthcoming Tuesday morning when former Senator Henry G. Davis, who was reported as being at death's door, drove down town at Elkins and mingled with friends.

He has so far recovered from a slight injury to his foot sustained in making a misstep while descending from the porch of Senator Elkins' home in the dark about a month ago that he is able to walk with ease. Senator Davis is enjoying better health than he has any time during the summer.

CRUSHED TO DEATH IN A GARRETT COUNTY MINE

John Koontz, 28 Years Old, Instantly Killed Yesterday Morning.

At the Arnold Run Mine, two miles south of Crellin, John Koontz, aged twenty-eight years, the father of three children, ranging in years from two to six, was instantly killed yesterday morning when a fall of the roof came in upon him, crushing his chest and ribs, death following almost instantly.

The man, along with four others employed in the mine, had gone to work at the usual hour and at about eight o'clock Koontz's fellow-workmen, engaged in another compartment of the mine, heard him set off a blast and he making no signal to the other men that everything was safe, the mine boss, Mr. Daniel Baker, went to where Koontz had been working and found that the explosion of the powder had loosened a huge rock in the roof of the mine, which descending had pinned Koontz to the pavement and that he was dead. An examination made later by Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh, who was summoned by telephone and reached the mine within an hour, revealed the fact that Mr. Koontz was crushed about his chest and that a number of ribs had been broken and he gave it as his opinion that death immediately followed.

The mine where the accident took place is owned by the Preston Lumber and Coal Company and is being operated by the Kendall Lumber Company to furnish fuel for its engines and boilers.

Besides his children Koontz leaves his widow, who was Ia Miss Teats, of near Cranesville, and an aged father, Jeremiah Koontz, who resides at Dola, W. Va., where he is employed as a miner by the National Fuel Company.

Wreck at Big Curve.

On Saturday night a wreck occurred at Big Curve on the 17-mile grade west of Everett's tunnel, blocking both tracks for several hours. A broken wheel caused the derailment and the breaking up of four cars. Both Keyser and Cumberland wreck crews were called immediately. Much damage was done, but fortunately no one was hurt. Passenger trains Nos. 1, 7, 12 and 4 were delayed several hours, the former not arriving in Oakland until 5 o'clock Sunday morning.

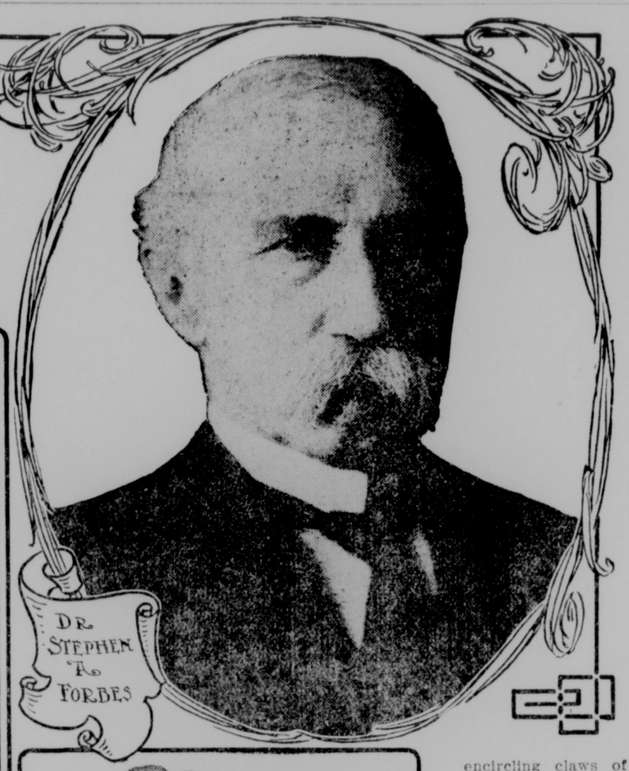
THE BATTLE WITH THE BUGS

By BERT E. POWELL



THERE is an underworld not invaded by novelist or playwright. Yet in it occur strange and often subtle dramas of survival and destruction. Nor is it a noiseless underworld. Every evening after a hot sunset it forms an orchestra which shrills out its prowess and flaunts its coming achievement. And in all the world there is no orchestra so well paid. To be sure it gets little in the matter of attention, but in ways more substantial it is rewarded handsomely. For it is permitted to levy toll upon the corn and the wheat, the cabbage and the apple, as they grow. It is allowed to eat the profits of the miller and the grain dealer. Certain members of the shrilling tribe go farther and demand greater concessions in their greed. Not satisfied with money tribute, they exact human lives. Their gruesome tracks are made upon the faces of little children. Then from places where poverty forces women and babies into filth and sickness, they take wing and they bear their death message into homes fair and clean—homes where the inmates cannot concern themselves with life's wretched ones. And so nature in her inexorable circle from which neither the proudest nor the poorest can escape, herself supplies the link which brings the miserable home to the fair one.

But reducing it to a dollars and cents basis which all of us understand, what would you say the insects of this country cost us each year? Millions of dollars! More in fact than our entire system of public school education, from the kindergarten to the university!

Moreover whole sections intended by nature for the production of particular crops often are compelled to abandon them for no other reason than insect infestation. This is especially true of horticulture. Myriad, indeed, are the insect foes that infest vegetables and fruit. If ever the life of this underworld is brought upon the stage as that of the barnyard has been, it may well open with this plaint of the truck grower:

> The insects are busy in clover and grass,
> A-hatchin' out sorrer fer my garden sass,
> They're happily hummin' this giddy refrain
> The old mule will still be your airy-o-plane.

Now the farmer has found himself helpless before this foe which must be fought with microscopes and laboratory mysteries. Consequently he has appealed to the man of science whom everyone despises in the day of prosperity and rushes to consult when the world is awry.

Let me tell you of what has been accomplished by one man with a microscope. His name is Stephen A. Forbes and he is state entomologist of Illinois. His chief work in this position is to exterminate "economic insects," as those which damage the growing things are called. He is also head of the state laboratory of natural history and professor of entomology in the University of Illinois. He has held these offices 25 years, which means that he has spent a quarter of a century fighting the predaceous instincts of economic insects, barring an occasional short lapse to fight the economical instincts of state legislatures. Naturally he is on intimate terms with a vast number of bugs.

For a practical knowledge of an insect, the ability to recognize it in all its phases is a mere beginning. Its dietary must be known, not only what it prefers but what it likes next best and what it will eat to escape starvation; how the weather affects its health, its temper, and its power of multiplying; is it subject to contagious diseases? If so, how may it be induced to catch one? Also it is well to know how its neighbor bugs regard it. Whether the sight of it arouses the instinct to protect or the instinct to kill. For there are bugs so kindly disposed toward other bugs that they will carry them to their food supply, hatch their eggs for them, and bring up their offspring. The sole duties they leave to those they protect are breathing, eating and multiplying.

First let me tell you about the fight against the chinch bug. As everyone knows, the chinch is a devil-devastator whose evil intentions are backed with energy and resourcefulness. When it starts to take what it wants from the farm there is just one thing it leaves—the mortgage. For more than a generation scientists in all parts of the country directed their intelligence against its instinct; and instinct won the victory. It seemed that reason could not fathom the cause of the outbreaks nor find a way to prevent them. In despair the men of science were for saying as did the old Irish woman of the rain that spoiled her potatoes. "There's no raison in it, it's just the will of God!"

And right there it seemed the problem would have to rest. But an occasional persistent brain was unable to accept this solution. Observations went on not only week by week but day by day, and often even hour by hour. Even so it was a work that proceeded slowly. The chinch bug was hard to make rules for. Indeed, it seemed more an exception to rule than the French language. For instance, scientists flattered themselves that one thing was proved concerning his chinchship viz., the abandonment of wheat culture meant an end to chinch bug ravages. But farmers made the sad discovery, quite unintentionally, you may be sure, not at all for the sake of enlightening the men of science, that the abandonment of wheat may even increase the chinch devastation. For if they have become numerous and can find no wheat, they will accept oats, barley, grass or corn. The abandonment of wheat to be effective against the chinch, must take place at the beginning of an outbreak.

Therefore Dr. Forbes straightened his mortarboard, polished his microscope and prepared for wholesale slaughter. He was going to wade deep, not in gore but in bug juice. The first plan was to present the chinch with a contagious disease. It had been observed that it was subject to a fungous disease similar to that of the common house fly, which left the dead covered with a white mould. Why not spread it? It was tried upon the university fields and the bugs took it most obligingly and died most successfully. Before it could be considered more than an experiment, however, it was necessary to try it on a larger scale. Consequently letters were sent among the farmers, asking for boxes of sound bugs. These bugs were to be given the disease and returned with directions for spreading it. The response was surprisingly immediate. Boxes of bugs poured into the express offices and yet more boxes of bugs. Farmers from neighboring states heard of the offer and they, too, went bug hunting. The express companies worked overtime. The assistants in the entomologist's office became mere undertakers for bugdom. The mouldy bugs were sent out on their beneficent mission of destruction. Then the results came in. They varied; they did, indeed. Some thought the entire entomologist's office should be fitted out with a golden, glorious halo as the rescuer of its country; others alas! thought a fool's cap would fit the case more exactly.

But although the disease project could not be called a complete success, means were found which make it possible to raise grain even in the very worst of the chinch outbreaks. The barrier methods and sprays with a kerosene emulsion will catch them every time. Just after harvest the scarcity of food in the wheat fields arouses in the chinch an instinct to migrate. On foot it sets out to get an appetite for corn. This is the time to make a ridge beween the infested field and the field the chinch desires to infest. This is done by plowing a backward furrow which is packed with a light roller or by hand and has a line of tar poured upon it from a can with a tubular spout. Post holes are dug at intervals of about twenty feet. By keeping the tar line fresh his chinchship cannot cross, but will follow it to the posthole, into which he speedily tumbles. It then is merely pleasant recreation for the farmer to travel out and pour a weak solution of kerosene upon his accumulated enemies. Kerosene is an excellent death dealer for these pests. When they get into the cornfields the farmers of Illinois sally forth with an emulsion containing four per cent. of kerosene and half as much whale oil soap mixed by five minutes simple beating with a stick. This is flirted by hand upon the corn in the cool of the day when the insects feed most thoroughly and when there is less danger of injury to the corn. Sometimes a single application does the work; when the infestation is very bad two and even three may be required.

Now let us talk about corn exclusively for a while. With that staple at its present price and with the grave gentlemen who produce statistics as hens produce eggs—the louder the cackling, the smaller the statistic—assuring us that it is on its lofty perch to stay, it seems that the farmer will have to cultivate automobiles and bad habits as obesity cures for his bank account. But, halt! Nature provides several. There is the weather, more exasperating and with less regard for a poor man's purse than rich relatives on a visit, there is the fretful soil which gets sour like a colicky baby, and there are sturdy, hungry insect foes. Over two hundred of these attack corn, forty capable of doing notable damage.

It is in discovering the way to conquer a pair of these precious rascals that Dr. Forbes has made his most valuable single contribution to science. They are the corn field ant and the corn root-aphis or, as it is better known, the corn root louse. For a long time they were the particular scourge of the corn grower who supposed that they operated each on its own account. Through the research of Dr. Forbes it is now known that one is helpless without the other. The resourceful and industrious ant is entirely unable to extract the coveted sap from the corn root, and the stupid aphis would, if left to itself, starve in the very presence of the corn. But the ant can carry the aphis to the corn root and deposit it thereupon; the aphis can extract the sap and then exude it, thus passing it on to the ant. Therefore it was not a problem of exterminating two foes but of outwitting the clever little ant. Were it banished, the aphis would soon disappear. The wretched little soft-bodied hunk o' creation can do nothing for itself except lay eggs and suck corn sap. The ant gives it a home in its own burrows, hatches its eggs for it, carrying them to the warm surface if they are slow, bearing them farther into the ground if they threaten to hatch before its food supply is ready. And this protection extends through the aphis' life. If, because of plowing or other inadvertence, the ant finds its charges scattered, it will cheerfully collect them and reconstruct its home if that has been molested also. The ant has nothing else to do and it is as active as an outraged Puritan conscience. However, methods of control have been found. The use of the disk and crop rotation will exterminate them. The root-aphis refuses entirely to occupy ground planted to oats, so this crop is of the greatest importance in clearing fields of them. Also by disking two or three times with a 20-inch disk in spring, especially on a sunny day when the ants are likely to have their charges near the surface, they will be killed and scattered and their nests so broken up that even the enthusiastic little ant cannot reconstruct the colony.

Another enemy of the corn that Dr. Forbes has caught by cultivation is the bill bug, as certain beetles are called because of their long, hard snouts, which they poke into the farmer's business to ruin it. This time the cultivation must be with the plow instead of the disk and in the autumn instead of spring and in the fields of grass where the bill bugs breed. These bugs are distinguished by a belligerency which is only equaled by their strength of claw. One variety appeared in Illinois which looked so large to the harassed farmers that it was christened "elephant bug." Chickens turned into the fields to feast upon them fled in flapping, comical flight, unable to relieve their terrified souls by a squawk, as their bills were tightly held together by the encircling claws of what were meant to be their banquets. As for sprays, the bugs throve upon them. Dr. Forbes had his assistants in the fields before it was found that plowing the infested grass in the autumn would practically do away with the pest.

Of all the foes which the agriculturist must fight, none presents a more difficult problem than the white grub. For one thing, there are many species. Illinois has about thirty—differing in habits, but all endowed with an original and hard working brand of natural cussedness. They attack plants at the roots, and it is not at all uncommon to find whole acres of grass where the sod can be rolled up like a carpet. By preference they devastate grass, but if the supply is scant, they are willing to ruin small grain, corn, strawberry plantations, woodlands, and, indeed, many other situations. They are especially difficult to combat because the life history is hard to follow from the first to the last stage. Only a single specimen has been bred from the egg to the beetle and its life cycle occupied three years.

So far the best remedy has been found to be in cropping, especially in planting the infested ground to clover. Well-known enemies of the white grub also are the festive porker, which will dig a foot for a nice fat one, and crows and crow blackbirds.

Occasionally a farmer notices that a field which has been brown from a grub ravage becomes green and alive. He is inclined to think it a clear case of the Lord remembering the righteous; as a matter of fact another insect has appeared and is working out another set of instincts. This is the Tiphia, a member of the solitary wasp family. It stings the grub into submission and then glues to its thick hide an egg which in a few days hatches into a veritable vampire. It sucks from its host its life juices, leaving the shell to crumble back to earth.

Trees, both those in natural forests and those which have been planted, "noble and helpless products of nature," to quote Dr. Forbes, are often dragged to a slow and unsightly death through insect infestation. Have you never late in May or in June noticed upon shade trees little wads of cotton? Each wad, you will see, if you look, projects from a brown cap, which is the female maple scale. It is a native insect parasite of the soft maple. It will infest, besides the maple, the linden, box elder, elm and honey locust. These cotton wads are the soft bed in which the careful female lays her eggs, and each female can be relied upon to deposit something like 3,000 eggs in her own particular little wad. Dr. Forbes found after considerable experiment that a kerosene emulsion was effective in disposing of these pests. A 20 per cent. emulsion could be used in winter if the roots of the trees were protected, and a 10 per cent. in summer. It is made by dissolving one pound of common soap in one gallon of water by boiling. This is removed from the fire and two gallons of kerosene poured in. With a spray pump the mixture is then forced back into itself for about five minutes, when it will look like a thick cream, and no longer separates on standing. Seventeen gallons of water added to the three gallons thus prepared will give a 10 per cent. solution. The cost will be 4.3 cents a gallon and three or four gallons will save a large tree from destruction.

Doubtless you have noticed upon the apples you brought home in a paper bag and those that fell from your own cherished tree a crescent mark. This means that a busy little curculio has had its beak in your apple before you and has probably laid an egg at the sign of the crescent curculios. A spray compound of 12½ ounces of acetate of lead and four ounces of arsenate of soda to fifty gallons of water, if used three or four times, will catch practically all these orchard destroyers.

Among the insects injurious to health the common housefly takes first rank. Dr. Forbes has found that 75 per cent. of the common houseflies breed in horse manure. As the remedies that will kill the housefly maggots are too dangerous to be used in stables, except boiling water, which is hardly practicable, the only protection seems to be in screening stables against flies as we do our houses and in careful city sanitation.

TEN YEARS OF SUFFERING.
Restored at Last to Perfect Health by Doan's Kidney Pills.

Mrs. Narcissa Waggoner, Carterville, Ill., says: "For over ten years I suffered terribly with backaches, headaches, nervous and dizzy spells. The kidney secretions were unnatural and gave me great trouble. One day I suddenly fell to the floor, where I lay for a long time unconscious. Three doctors who treated me diagnosed my case as paralysis and said they could do nothing more for me. As a last resort, I began using Doan's Kidney Pills and was permanently cured. For Hot Weather

When the sun strengthens and blazes in the sky and heat becomes a factor to reckon with in dress, and everything else, millinery must be cool looking or it will fail to be attractive. All white or combinations of white with black, give us the crispest and best effects for the dog days. But white set off with a bit of scarlet, deft blue or leaf green is smart and effective also, and may be chosen instead of white with black.

Black for day time wear is not cool looking except when made of the thinest fabrics, like lace and net. The big black hats of hair braid or pyroxyline are lacy in texture and the admiration and the darling of the summer girl's heart. This season they belong to the "mystery" class; those hats that come down over the head, veiling the eyes and showing the profile from one side only. The corday hats of net and lace or those made on the "helmet" shapes have captivated as many as the big drooping picture hats.

A lovely hat for the hot weather is shown here made of dead white chip, overlaid with black chantilly lace. A grouping of four immense roses in tulle and silk is mounted across the front, they are almost colorless with a blush of pale pink at the edges of some of the petals. The effect is of millinery as light as air.

A pretty sailor for practical wear is trimmed with white wings and a coronet of plaited ribbon across the front. The shape is a Milan in the natural pale yellow of the finished hat. All the trimming is pure white and a crisp satin faced ribbon is chosen for making the plaiting.

A floating washable lace veil is the thing generally worn with these sailors.

CHARMING LINGERIE GOWN

Exceedingly Pretty Dress Eminently Suitable for Garden Party or River Wear.

A very charming lingerie gown has a smartly cut skirt tucked flounce, upon which appears a row of vandyked insertion, the insertion being continued at the top of the flounce in the same form, and appearing at intervals upon the skirt, the center immediately below the knee being beautifully embroidered. The bodice has a collar of valenciennes lace, insertions of which appear in dainty design upon the bodice and upon the long sleeves and waist belt, the center of the bodice being embroidered to match the skirt. This is an exceedingly pretty and useful model, and is eminently suitable for garden party or river wear. This model is the one illustrated above.

Effective Sofa Pillows.

An effective and easily made sofa pillow for a summer home is made in oblong shape, 14 by 20 inches.

The pillow is covered with plain heavy weave crash in ecru or gray. Two inches from each end are bands of flowered cretonne three inches wide crossing the pillow. These bands are edged on both sides with narrow ecru lace applied flat.

Another variation had the body of the pillow of flowered chintz or cretonne with bands of figured ecru linen such as is used for furniture covering. The ends of this pillow have a two-inch wide linen lace in ecru tints.

ART IN WEARING OF SASH

Height and Breadth Can Be Increased or Toned Down by Draping of Sash.

There is a great deal of art in the wearing of a sash. One can increase one's height or one's breadth, adorn a plain gown, tone down an elaborate one, give a touch of distinction to one's whole appearance, simply by the way in which the sash is draped and adjusted.

Try wearing the sash in shawl style over the shoulders, caught by a stitch in back and tucked under the girdle, to fall in diagonal lengths to just above the ankles.

Or wind it twice around the waist, like a girdle; cross it in front and fasten with a knot at the sides of the skirt below the knees.

Then there is the Scotch tartan effect, especially attractive with a plaid scarf, where there is a broad band over the left shoulder, a narrow draped one over the back and the right, and a knot at the waist on the left side, so that the sash falls in a broad width almost to the bottom of the frock.

The adjustment of the sash may well have reference to the concealment of some defect in the garment it covers—a tiny tear, perhaps, or an ineradicable stain. It should emphasize the good points of the figure and hide the bad. That is why the old fashion of the stiff bow at the back was so bad; it made every woman look stout.

Give a little thought to the draping of your sash, and half your battle for beauty of appearance is won.

The Dainty Negligee.

Dainty negligees appeal to most women and when these pretty garments can be made at home without much trouble they are especially interesting. In one model seen recently the material was fine white cross bar dimity and might have been cut by a simple long kimono pattern. The neck was finished with a large shawl collar of persian lawn and valenciennes insertion, and the large flowing sleeves were in the same lingerie effect. Both sleeves and collar were edged with a lace frill. A casing of the lawn was sewed on the gown at short waist length and was threaded with pink ribbons which tied in the front at the ends of the deep collar.

Tulle Roses.

A charming trimming on a pink silk evening dress seen recently consisted of a cluster of five roses, formed of pink tulle, with green tulle stems twisted over thin wire, sewed to the left side of the low neck. The effect was exceedingly attractive, and showed again the value of the little touches to raise a gown from the commonplace.

WAGON BED CONVERTED INTO DIFFERENT USES

Agriculturist Has Often Found It Hardship to Be Obliged to Buy or Build Number of Vehicles Required on Farm.

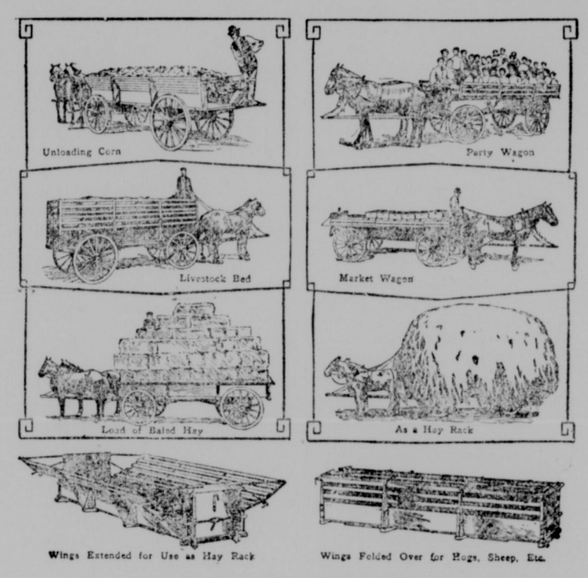
A convertible wagon bed which can be changed into 15 different kinds of bodies for different uses around a farm, without adding to it or taking from it a single piece, has been designed and is undoubtedly the most radical improvement made in farm wagons for a decade, says Popular Mechanics.

In a few minutes it can be transformed from a hay rack into a wagon for carrying live stock, and with equal quickness it can be converted into a vehicle for carrying a large number of passengers who can be provided with comfortable seats along the sides for picnicking, etc.

The remarkable versatility of the new wagon bed is secured by hinged malleable iron pieces attached to the sides. These support two folding sections on each side. The strain which is put upon these pieces when heavy loads are placed on the wagon makes it imperative that they should be of strong, dependable material.

The agriculturist has often found it a hardship to be obliged to buy or build a number of wagons for the multifarious requirements incident to the operation of a farm. The wagon that could serve to carry boxes or crated vegetables and berries to market would not be of any use when haying time came around. When it was necessary to carry calves or live stock, still another wagon must be called into service.

While reapers, threshers, and other farm implements have been continually improved, the farm wagon has remained practically at a standstill. Perhaps the fact that the automobile has made such wonderful progress has served to overshadow the humble beast of burden and his reliable wagon. Old Dobbin may be a second rater now, but he will continue for some time to fill his particular sphere of endeavor with a faithfulness which the motor car cannot always be relied upon to give.



A Wagon Bed of Many Uses.

RIDDING FARM OF GRASSHOPPER

Favorite Remedy, Recommended By Colorado Agricultural College Is Arsenic Bran Mash.

(By S. ARTHUR JOHNSON, Colorado Agricultural College.)

In spite of the fact that a great deal of work has been done by experiment stations on grasshoppers, no royal road to control has yet been found. Each attack has to be considered on its own merits and relief sought through the most promising channel.

One of the favorite remedies is arsenic bran mash. This is made by mixing one pound of white arsenic with 25 pounds of bran. The arsenic is so near the color of the flour in the bran that it is not easy to tell when the mixing is well done. To overcome this difficulty, the arsenic may first be collected by adding a little dry paint.

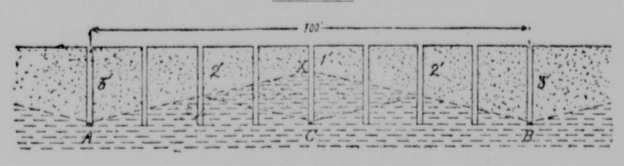
After the bran and arsenic are well mixed they should be moistened with water. Put in just enough to make the particles stick together. This mixture should be scattered where the grasshoppers are thickest. If the insects are invading a garden or potato patch, it is well to scatter the bran mash about the borders. In the fields of alfalfa or grain, the bran should be scattered where the grasshoppers congregate on ditch banks and dry places. All the insects will not find and eat it, but many will and often the crop can be fairly well protected. The writer has never used this preparation against young grasshoppers, but some farmers state that the crops may be completely protected by its use, while others claim that they will not eat it.

Of course, it will not do to scatter his substance where chickens will be likely to pick it up, and none of the mixture must be left where domestic animals are apt to get it or be led from the vessel.

Good Exercise.

There is no harm in pigs rooting if they are in a field where rooting will do no harm. Pigs can secure much feed by rooting and the exercise will do them good. Where troublesome roots infest the soil they will often eradicate them if allowed to do so. The fattening hog should not be allowed to root, as the exercise consumes too much feed and energy.

TILE DRAINS IN CLAY SOIL



= drained soil
= undrained soil
= soil undrained when drains are 100 feet apart, but drained when they are 50 feet apart

The illustration shown herewith is from a bulletin of the Ontario Department of Agriculture and shows how the water table of the soil depends on the location of drains. If in a field that is underdrained three feet deep a number of holes are dug it would be observed after a heavy rain that in those nearest the drains no water would remain. In the hole situated half-way between the drains at C would hold considerable water for a few days.

In a clay in fairly good condition it will be found that the slope of the water table is about 1 foot in 25, in loam 1 foot in about 33. The illustration represents a clay soil with drains A and B 100 feet apart. Wells are dug 12.5 feet apart. At the end of 48 hours after a heavy rain the water will stand about as indicated by zig-zag lines, in a gradient of about 1 in 25, and hence will be two feet deeper in the centre well than at either drain. Hence if the drains are three feet deep there will be three feet of drained soil over A and B, but only one foot at X. Capillarity and soil resistance to water flow play an important part in holding the water highest half way between the drains, and the gradient 1 in 25 represents their combined strength in clay, hence after this gradient is reached drainage becomes very, very slow, and the water table stands in this irregular shape until lowered by evaporation from the soil and plants. But during the months of April, May and sometimes June, when the rains supply at the surface all the water needed for evaporation, none is drawn from below for this purpose, hence during the early months of growth the water stands as indicated by the dotted line AXB. Consequently root development is hampered at X, as 1 foot of soil is not enough. There are two ways to remedy the defect, either to dig A and B deeper or else put a drain at C half way between.

Doll House Library.

A search for a child's short story, "The Griffin and the Minor Canon," in a volume all by itself revealed to a persistent city shopper the thought and money that are expended on the furnishing of dolls' houses. Book stores had not the story in a single volume, but in a department store one young woman interviewed had recently been transferred from the toy department and was able to contribute a helpful hint.

"I think," she said, "you can find it in one of the dolls' houses downstairs."

Curiosity had by that time become a sauce to literature, so the shopper hurried downstairs to inspect the doll houses. Three of the most expensive houses contained libraries consisting of a score of diminutive books and each book contained a child's story complete. One of them was "The Griffin and the Minor Canon."

Quotation Marks.

Senator Beveridge, in an after-dinner speech in Cleveland, said of a corrupt politician:

"The man's excuse is as absurd as the excuse that a certain minister offered on being convicted of plagiarism.

"'Brethren,' said this minister, 'it is true that I occasionally borrow for my sermons, but I always acknowledge the fact in the pulpit by raising two fingers at the beginning and two at the end of the borrowed matter, thus indicating that it is quoted.'"

A Five-Cent Washwoman.

In Evanston, Illinois, washwomen get from $2 to $2.50 per day, and carfare to and from work. Five years ago they got $1.50 a day. Naturally wash day is an expensive day there. But now women everywhere are learning of a wash-day worker that only costs a nickel. Easy Task laundry soap does half the work all by itself, saves money, saves time, saves fuel, saves health and saves clothing. Many women say it solves the servant problem.

Included Her.

"Why did she get angry at the stranger in town?"

"She asked him if he had seen her daughter and he answered that he had seen all the sights of the place."

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1910.

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEE FOR CONGRESS.

For the first time in the history of Maryland the Republican and Democratic parties on Tuesday nominated their respective candidates for Congress under a state-wide primary election law. This law was enacted at the recent session of the Legislature and the result of the vote on Tuesday was watched with interest by voters of both parties. The contest in this the Sixth District between Messrs. Warner, Blair and Hagner, was warm from start to finish and it was thought that owing to the interest manifested the vote would be large, but the result was disappointing in the extreme, as less than thirty per cent. of the total registered vote of the combined Republican and Democratic parties in Garrett county exercised their right to cast their ballots at Tuesday's elections. In Allegany county a little more than twenty-five per cent. of the vote was out and this condition also prevailed in Frederick, Washington and Montgomery counties.

However, the result in this District has been the naming of one whom every true Republican can and will support with enthusiasm, for after the retirement of Col. Pearre from the race Mr. Warner, the successful candidate, was manifestly the choice of the great majority of the rank and file of the party and he will draw to himself the undivided vote of that party. He has earned the distinction of being a fair fighter and an untiring campaigner; he is energetic and is equipped in every sense of the word to represent ably and intelligently the needs of the people of the great Sixth District in the halls of Congress.

There is no sane reason why the united Republicans should not center upon a fight with their assets used to the best advantage. They have a candidate in the District who towers above his Democratic opponent in every particular. They should take advantage of every opportunity to say a good word for their nominee. Work for his election from now until the votes are cast and counted in November. Every Republican, with shoulder to shoulder, no matter what may be said concerning the past, for that is gone, should work and fight for the success of their candidate. With this one object in view Mr. Warner's election should be a matter of sincere concern to every Republican, for all are loyal and all should show their zeal by unremitting energy.

TREAT THE ROADS KINDLY.

With this plaintive plea the Governor jumps into the lime light as a full blown humorist. And yet we have never heard Governor Crothers classed as a humorist. Reformer, jurist, preacher—these undoubtedly. Lawyer (formerly), agriculturist (eternally), public officer (when possible). But the role of humorist is a new one and wears all the interest of an entire surprise when assumed by one who seldom "speaks but to instruct." After hearing the Governor's solemn assertions that roads were meant to travel on, or feeling the weight of his pathetic appeals for purity in poltics, or bowing the head and worshipping as he pronounces his semi-priestly benediction upon his own immaculate administration with the spell of the spirit of all these things (and then some) upon us, it is a most effective surprise, a fair little sudden sunbeam in a darksome cavern, to have the Governor come tumbling on the boards in jester's garb. "Treat the roads kindly"—and with this quib the jester's part is on. We are not entirely sure that the Governor meant to exactly pose as a jester, but so the audience has assumed, and the humor of the thing has caught on. Everybody is laughing—except possibly the Governor (which by the way is excellent good form—the accomplished jester leaves all the laughter to the audience). And the audience is furnishing it in this instance. The comicality of His Excellency's appeal is irresistible. "Treat the roads kindly." Sure, Governor, that's what they are meant for. Any old road can be treated any old way. But one of your up-to-date ten-thousand-dollar-beauty roads is different. "Kindly treatment" is ITS only proper due. Traction engines will please take notice and shie into the fields or let the wheat crops go unthreshed. The smith will forsake his forge and join the rubber trust, for no unfeeling steed shall press his iron shod hoof upon the gentle bosom of a ten thousand dollar road. Perish the thought of a common farm wagon rattling its hard-hearted tires upon an "improved" surface, where a whole mint of the people's money has been spent for that which must be "treated kindly." You, poor fool, thought that road was meant for USE. But, mark you, "kindly" use. What, did you suppose that a $10,000 road could, should or would stand the strain of ordinary travel? Not at all. It is an airy-fairy something for soft pedal action; when, for example, one would recreate himself in his auto-car (a la Crothers-Tucker and Co.) or would go forth at eventide for a meditative stroll—in his bare feet. For the common things of common life, find a dirt road, or find yourself under the ban of the Governor's displeasure for not treating the roads as kindly as you ought. Humor? Why it is past doubt the hit of the season. Nothing funnier has come on the boards than this naive appeal of the Governor to "treat the roads kindly."

Never again can a normal man look on an improved road without "laughter, holding both sides." It is a little expensive humor, but it is humor par excellence. We shall henceforth know exactly what to do when in the presence of one of those unspeakable aggregations of uncorrelated rocks, known as an "improved road." We shall pat it kindly on the back and then laugh. The pat will show our willingness to heed the Governor's request and "treat the road kindly." The laugh will be our remuneration (our one and only remuneration) for our contribution to the fair, fragile creature's existence. And then, well then we shall go back to our dear old dirt road with humble soul and an everlasting apology. "You dear old dirt highway—we have kicked you and cuffed you and 'cussed' you galore, but you have stood it like a man. Gouged and grilled, beaten with many blows and travel-stained with the years you have borne your burdens without complaint and without shirking. You have left that sort of thing to this crowning triumph of the road builder's art. It has remained for the stone quarry to beg the public to "treat it kindly." Blessed old brave dirt roads, with all your wrinkles and ruts, your mud and misery, you are worth a thousand new-fangled toys that have to be put under glass and labelled "please treat kindly.' "—Cecil Whig.

A WORD IN SEASON.

A word in season to the man who has become despondent brings cheer; to the one overwrought, with nerves all a tingle, it brings calmness; to the one who is drifting upon the shoals of bad habits it brings a sense of danger; to the disconsolate comfort, to the timid courage, to the laborer in the field of human weal strength for his unappreciated task. Who can do without it? The faculty of speech would be but the faculty of making intelligible sounds if the words that fall from the mouth could not be keyed at times to comfort and cheer. The world possesses much of the speech of wisdom, but how very much it needs the speech of cheer!

Yet everyone may give the word in season to the one who is weary, to the one who is in the state where unless sympathy comes, he must give up Men are buoyed up by words of cheer. They are sustained by words of strength and heart. In business, where the deal and contracts reign supreme, there is the widest opportunity for the word of cheer. The word in season to the young man entering upon the activities of life is the word of direction and guidance; to the young woman who is a prey to the indefinite longings of her nature, in whom emotions are moving and impulses framing to no end, the word in season comes as the word that centers her being upon some of the realities of nature and life. She receives clear vision, the illusions that misled is gone, and she ever after walks strong in the faith of life, firm in its rectitude, supported by the sense of the dignity and worth of womanhood. The word in season comes to the tired mother. Oh, multitude of them! Thrown back upon themselves, with a sence of bafflement, they grow discourage. Then a word in season brings cheer and the mother takes up her task ag in with better success.

It also comes to the tempted and the drifting ones and they see the perils of their courses and make amends for their yielding to the seductions of temptation and wrongdoing. The word in season means support and vigor for the weak. It means triumph instead of defeat. It means the developement of the energies of the soul. It means all that it has meant to many a man and woman who dates to some timely word the change in the course of their destiny and their uplift from dispair.

The one who cannot look back upon some word in season that ordered his life has either been very fortunate in not needing such a word or else he has been most unfortunate in not receiving it. It is the word that has soothing balm, remedial power. It is the word of brotherhood. How the heart of man is warmed when he feels that its pulsations are in common with the pulsations of some other heart, that he is not alone in his doubts and misgivings, in his struggles and difficulties, but that there is a linking up of his life with other lives. He is glad to feel the cheer where there had been discouragement.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The season nearing a close has been the most successful, as to number of visitors, in the history of the Park. We are not informed as to the amount of the gate receipts, but feel quite sure that a stronger program would have added a large sum to the net receipts.

We understand that three prominent lots have been sold recently on which two cottages will be erected for occupancy next season.

Many of our summer residents will remain later than usual owing to the comforts of natural gas.

One of the greatest meetings of the season will be held next Sunday—morning, afternoon and evening—when three bishops, three returned missionaries and three prominent laymen will address the meetings. People in the neighborhood should come with their lunch baskers and stay all day.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Baptist church held a successful Japanese Bazaar and supper on the verandah of the Hicks House Tuesday evening.

Messrs. H. E. Flowers, of Baltimore, and Gay W. Hayden, of Grafton, came here to vote in the primary election Tuesday.

Rev. Jahu DeWitt Miller was here several days this week, the guest of Dr. and Mrs. W. L. Davidson.

Our annual hay fever visitors are arriving in considerable numbers.

The status of Mountain Lake Park as a corporation will be determined before Chief Judge Boyd at a hearing to be held September 15th. Mr. Thos. J. Peddicord will represent the citizens.

After next Sunday regular services morning and evening will be resumed in the M. E. church.

Mr. John W. Lee, aged 82 years, who was struck by a train at the station and painfully injured on Aug. 24th, is on the way to recovery.

BITTINGER.

On Saturday morning, August 27th, this section was visited by a frost of sufficient severity to damage growing crops of buckwheat and other tender vegetation in some localities.

James Frye and family, who spent several weeks in this village, at the home of Jonas Bittinger, returned to their home at Braddock, Pa.

Messrs. Hershberger and Deifenbaugh, of Grantsville, took two parties from this village to Mt. Lake Park in their automobiles on Wednesday of last week.

Miss Beulah Getty and Miss W. Bonig, of Grantsville, spent last Sunday as the guests of Miss Ruth Beahm.

George Stark, son of Mr. and Mrs. Peter G. Stark, accidentally fell from the mow in his father's barn one day last week and sustained a sprained ankle.

Silas Platter and Christian Schrock are very happy individuals since the stork visited their respective homes last week.

Mrs. T. B. Wiley spent a few days last week at the bedside of her sister, Miss Dollie Winterburg, at Grantsville, and reports her sister's condition rather serious.

Mrs. Melchor Hetrick spent a portion of last week visiting relatives at Mt. Lake Park and Oakland.

Our highly respected neighbor and aged friend, Henry Beitzell, Sr., died suddenly at his home near this village on Monday afternoon of this week. Mr. Beitzell had been sick but a short time and his death was a decided shock to the community and all feel a genuine sympathy for the bereaved family. The entire community will feel the loss of so estimable a man.

Mrs. J. Alvin Friend, of Sang Run, was here one day last week.

The buzz of the threshing machine is heard once more and farmers report a good crop of oats.

Mrs. Louise Hoye, Mr. Paul and Miss Alice Hove, of Sang Run, accompanied by Miss Boardman, of Trumansburg, N. Y., spent Sunday at T. C. Hinebaugh's.

Miss Ethel Glotfelty, who has been visiting relatives at Oakland and Deer Park, has returned home.

GREAT IMPROVEMENT BEING MADE

B. & O. Expending Millions in Eliminating Curves and Grades.

More important and costly engineering projects are engaging the attention of the Baltimore and Ohio management just now than ever before in the history of that "pioneer road." The objects of these improvements, as a matter of course, is primarily to secure roadbed conditions that will permit the use of heavier engines and cars, although much of the work is being undertaken with a view to shortening distances. Despite the contumely that has been heaped upon the road in the past because of its grades and curves, it is a fact not generally known that it crosses the mountains now at a lower grade than any of its competitors by many feet, which gradient is being lowered still more, while many of the most pronounced curves are being reduced materially or eliminated entirely.

The new work, which is either now in progress or authorized for early construction, extends from one end of the system to the other, from New York and Baltimore to Chicago and St. Louis, and was outlined Saturday by an official of the company.

Beginning in the east and working westward, the first work encountered is the re-constructed bridge across the Schuylkill river. Then, in order, comes the great stone-arch viaduct over the Brandywine and the new Susquehanna river bridge, while at Baltimore numerous dangerous grade crossings are being eliminated.

The Cumberland division carries the largest tonnage of the system and it is being improved with a third track between Martinsburg and Orleans Road. On the famous 17-mile grade between Piedmont and Altamont, at which latter point the road attains its highest elevation in the mountains, passing tracks are being constructed to facilitate the heavy traffic, while on the summit of the Alleghanies between Deer Park and Mountain Lake Park a continuous third track is under construction. Between Terra Alta and Grafton will be built a third track over the entire section, making for the uninterrupted operation of passenger traffic, at the same time securing increased efficiency in the handling of freight traffic. It is on this section, too, that the great double-track smokeless tunnel will be constructed. Also, at the end of the Cumberland division, at Grafton, a new yard is being constructed that will receive the coal and other traffic from the Pennsylvania and West Virginia territory and wherein it will be classified.

Westward over the line to Pittsburg a third track is being built between Philson and Manila and Sand Patch and Yoder, at the west end of the Hyndman grade. Sand Patch tunnel is to be eliminated and replaced by a new double track tunnel 2.6 miles long on the revised line projected westward to Meyersdale, whereby passenger movement will be greatly facilitated, and at the same time a low-grade freight line from the Somerset coal field to the summit of the mountains secured, from which point further movement eastward is down hill, still further westward on the line a third track is to be constructed between Connellsville and McKeesport.

The Everett, Rodemar, Murray and Hitchcock tunnels on the Cumberland division are to be eliminated and made open cuts, thereby adding to the safety and comfort of all train movements.

The foregoing comprises only the larger work being done by the Baltimore and Ohio, but does not include numerous smaller improvements over the entire system.

AFRAID OF CROTHERS BRAND OF REFORM.

It is entirely likely that the Baltimore police force could be much improved but people with just a little gray matter left are viewing with indignation the bold move of Crothers to get control of it by coercing the Commissioners into naming "his man" for Marshal. It is about time that this schemer should be called down and everybody will feel an increased measure of respect for the members of the Board who refused to be made his pliant tools. Baltimore has had a pretty tough time of it under Democratic management. Bribery and corruption have been rampant; weak and vacillating has been the course of the city administration and high political officials has been caught pilfering and accepting money from private interests. Perhaps a change all around will be the only way to clear the political atmosphere and give the city what it needs—decent, honest and efficient administration. But the good people of that town want none of the Crothers brand of reform and they have told him so, so emphatically that up to this writhe has not carried out his threats to remove the Police Commissioners if they would not do as he said.

Real Estate for Sale.

I will sell at private sale 80 acres, more or less, one-fourth of a mile from Altamont station. Twenty-five acres cleared land. All nice laying land, well watered, all smooth land, and there is about one hundred thousand feet of good saw timber on it, or I will sell said saw timber and keep the land.

I will also sell Military Lot No. 1164 near Fairfax Stone, in this county, all covered with timber. Said land is principally level. Apply to "Governor" John Wesley Lee, who was so badly injured last Wednesday by being struck by a train at Mountain Lake Park and who was taken to the Home Sanitorium where he is a patient, is very much improved and was able yesterday to sit up the greater part of the day. His injuries were of such nature that at first it was thought he could not recover.

This afternoon at two o'clock the trustees appointed in the case by the court will sell at public auction in front of the First National Bank the Promised Land Farm, located near Hutton. The property is a very valuable one, containing nearly four hundred acres and is underlaid with several veins of coal approximating 28 feet in thickness.

The Watcher.

As he sits alone in the silence,
And lists to the passing years;
The summers come with their fruitage—
The winters come with their tears.

There seems no end to the waiting;
Time passes with heavy tread.
That which was joy in the morning
At evening is cold and dead.

The rustle of leaves in the pathway;
The patter of falling rain,
The shadows gathering dimly
As the wind sings a deep refrain

Cause the eyes of the tired watcher,
As he sits by the wayside there,
To turn with tender longing
To the gates of the City fair.

From which with bright effulgence
There shines a golden glow
With a brilliance like the sunlight,
With a purity like the snow.

Those gates shall ope in the morning
And through them passing down
Shall come the shining angels
Bearing a starry crown.

Then past are the days of waiting!
Then past are the marching years!
Then past is the heart's dull aching!
Then past are the doubts and fears!

For the call has come to the watcher—
His night has passed away.
And glowing are the hilltops
With the light of Perfect Day.

His cares are left behind him,
His doubts and all his fears;
And like a worn out garment,
The burden of the years.

Attended by the angels
He never more will roam,
But sweeping through the portals
Enter within his home.

A Home of matchless beauty
In a City bright and fair
Prepared for those who love Him
By the Savior waiting there.

The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

England's Earliest Monument

To American eyes, Aylesford, a quiet Kentish village lying under the chalk hills near Maidstone, is venerable enough. The church with its square embattled tower, the gabled houses, more particularly the gray stone bridge, narrow of arch and low of parapet, all these are eloquent of the days when the pilgrims from southern England crossed the Medway here on their journey to Becket's shrine.

Beyond the river a mile nearer Canterbury stands a memorial of times more remote by a thousand years than the last of the pilgrimages. Three upright slabs of unhewn sandstone, capped by a fourth which measures twelve feet in length, inclose a space of some eight feet square. The country people call it "Kit's Coty House." It is an empty tomb of ancient British date. All the Celtic peoples interred their chiefs in such chambers of unhewn stone, over which they heaped huge mounds of earth. In modern times these hillocks, covered with grass and marking perhaps the site of forgotten battlefields, came to be called "barrows." After having remained undisturbed for centuries, some of these barrows were opened in this inquiring age in the interests of science. The stone chamber within the grave, which antiquarians call a "dolmen," was found to contain human remains, along with the ornaments and weapons of a chief. The dolmen in a perfect condition is a closed chamber.

Kit's Coty House is a dolmen which has been partly dilapidated. The sepulcher has been opened, when or by whom, nobody knows; and its contents have disappeared. There is no inscription on any of the stones. But high authority supports the established tradition that here was buried Catigern, the British chief who fell, fighting against Hengist the invader, at the battle of Aylesford in 455 A. D.

The names of Horsa, Hengist's kinsman and fellow-leader who was killed in the fight, survives in Horstead, where perhaps he was buried. The white horse, which was Hengist's totem, is now the heraldic emblem of the English county of Kent. Whatever monuments of the battle of Aylesford once existed, all have now disappeared but Kit's Coty House. So the British prince's tomb has become the sole memorial of the first triumph of the Teuton. It is the earliest of English monuments.

HONORED AS POTATO PIONEER

That Sir Francis Drake, first man to sail around the world, intrepid seafighter and bold explorer, should be honored especially as the man who first introduced potatoes into Europe was the idea of the people of Offenburg, Germany. In that town stands a fine statue of Drake. His left elbow rests on an anchor and in his left hand he holds a well-grown potato plant, potatoes and all. There is a globe at his right foot and a vessel behind him, and in his right hand he carries a map of South America.

PRISON CELL ROMANCE.

An interesting story has come to light of the way in which a man undergoing a sentence in Pentonville prison, tamed and made a companion of a pigeon. One bitterly cold morning just before Christmas, whilst the prisoners were at exercise, a pigeon, half-dead with the cold, fell into the yard. A convict picked it up, hid it in his breast, and took it back to his cell, where in the evening he shared his food with the bird. Wishing to keep the bird for company, he hid the bird in his breast every time the warder came round. Quickly the pigeon became tame, and a fast friendship arose, which helped to pass the weary hours of prison life. At last, however, his secret became known to his fellow-convicts, and one man threatened to inform the officials. The man told his story to a Salvation Army officer who visited the prison, and the latter advised him to appeal to the governor, who, interested in the man's kind action, gave him permission to keep the bird. The man has now been released, and was helped into work by some kindly-hearted people who got to know the little story of the pigeon.

SARACEN TREASURES FOUND

Some interesting discoveries are reported in France. Recently in excavations at the Abbey of Fonteyrault some tombs were brought to light, which are considered to date from the Plantagenets. But at Senons we get a glimpse of periods more remote, for there discoveries have been made of jewels, medals, and arms. These are believed to have belonged to the Saracens, who were defeated by Charles Martel in 732.

TRIAL BY TELEPHONE.

The fact that contagious diseases cannot be transmitted over the telephone wires enabled Judge F. E. Bowser of Warsaw, Ind., to try a case at home while quarantined because his children had scarlet fever. The judge heard the evidence by telephone and imposed a fine and a 60-day sentence upon a young man for stealing.

ELEPHANTS' BATHING TANK

Some months ago the management of the National Zoological park in Washington decided that the elephants in captivity needed a bath tub and ordered a huge tank made. After considerable planning and figuring, the work of excavation was begun for this monster reservoir. Ton after ton of dirt was scooped out until there resulted a splendid bath tub 40 feet wide, sloping gently down to a depth of more than 15 feet. Around this was constructed a concrete wall solid enough to withstand the kicks and cavortings of the strongest elephant. A strong wooden barrier encloses the bathtub and effectually prevents the elephants from rambling off through the park after they have had their daily dip. It is very interesting to watch the big animals as they splash around in the cool water, or stand idly still and blink their little dark eyes in perfect content. They seem to be in their perfect element when deep in the waters. The bottom of the bathing tank is paved with rock so placed as to keep the big pachyderms from slipping, as they surely would do if they tried to maintain their balance on a smooth concrete floor covered with ooze. The management of the park have felt amply repaid for the expense involved in the construction of the enormous bathtub, for it vastly improves the health and temper of the clumsy beasts in their charge.

ANT HEAP IN BELGIAN CONGO

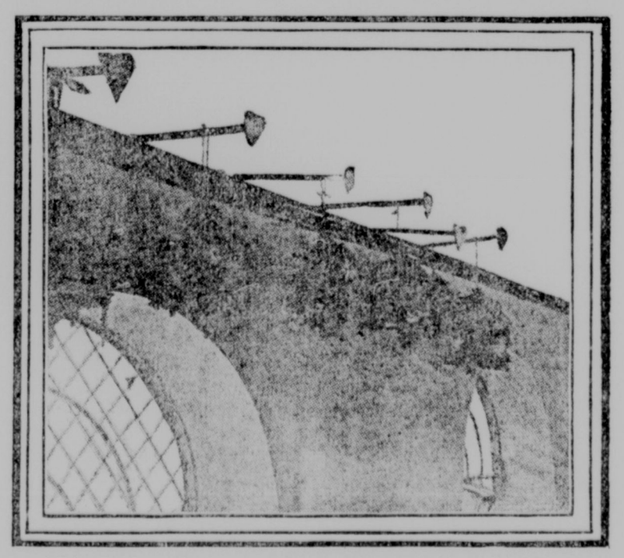
In the Belgian Congo are to be found thousands of enormous chambered nests or heaps constructed by the industrious ants of that land. A great variety of choice ferns and begonia plants grow on these ant heaps, and in many cases they are covered with bamboo 30 feet high. The heap shown in the accompanying illustration is 77 yards in circumference and the trees on the top are over 20 feet high. Its great size will be apparent on comparing it with the man standing at the bottom.

Feats of Rhetoric.

"You used to say that boy of yours wouldn't amount to anything because he was a poet."

"I was mistaken. He makes a fine living getting up names for fancy drinks at soda fountains."—Exchange.

Quaint Reward of Constancy



In the quaint little church at Minsterley, in Shropshire, England, are preserved seven "maiden garlands" which are relics of an interesting custom of the eighteenth century. The tradition concerning them is that when a maiden whose betrothed had died was herself carried, still unwed, to the grave, one of these crowns of garlands was borne before her coffin by the village girls. The date of the earliest specimen in Minsterley church is 1726, and the latest 1794. When the funeral was over, the wreath was hung up in the church, over the place the maiden had been wont to occupy, to commemorate her constancy. The framework of the wreaths shown in the accompanying photograph is adorned with frills of what was once white paper, and in the center is a representation of a pair of gloves, also in paper.

TUBERCULOSIS IN THE PRISON

Per Cent. of Suffering Is Enormous and There Seems but One Remedy.

From several investigations that have been made by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis it is estimated that on an average about 15 per cent. of the prison population of the country is afflicted with tuberculosis. On this basis, out of the 80,000 prisoners housed in the penal institutions of the United States at any given time, no less than 12,000 are infected with the disease. If the Philippine islands and other insular possessions were taken into consideration the number would be much larger. Some of the prisons of Pennsylvania, Kansas and Ohio show such shocking conditions with reference to tuberculosis that many wardens admit that these places of detention are death traps. Similar conditions could be found in almost every state, and in the majority of cases the only sure remedy is the destruction of the old buildings and the erection of new ones.

LEG A MASS OF HUMOR

"About seven years ago a small abrasion appeared on my right leg just above my ankle. It irritated me so that I began to scratch it, and it began to spread until my leg from my ankle to the knee was one solid scale like a scab. The irritation was always worse at night and would not allow me to sleep, or my wife either, and it was completely undermining our health. I lost fifty pounds in weight and was almost out of my mind with pain and chagrin as no matter where the irritation came, at work, on the street or in the presence of company, I would have to scratch it until I had the blood running down into my shoe. I simply cannot describe my suffering during those seven years. The pain, mortification, loss of sleep, both to myself and wife is simply indescribable on paper and one has to experience it to know what it is.

"I tried all kinds of doctors and remedies but I might as well have thrown my money down a sewer. They would dry up for a little while and fill me with hope only to break out again just as bad if not worse. I had given up hope of ever being cured when I was induced by my wife to give the Cuticura Remedies a trial. After taking the Cuticura Remedies for a little while I began to see a change, and after taking a dozen bottles of Cuticura Resolvent in conjunction with the Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment, the trouble had entirely disappeared and my leg was as fine as the day I was born. Now after a lapse of six months with no signs of a recurrence I feel perfectly safe in extending to you my heartfelt thanks for the good the Cuticura Remedies have done for me. I shall always recommend them to my friends. W. H. White, 312 E. Cabot St., Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 4 and Apr. 13, 1909."

THE DOCTOR'S IDEA.

Invalid—Doctor, I must positively insist upon knowing the worst.

Dr. Wise—Well, I guess my bill will be about $85.

In the Desert.

Here is a glimpse of the horrors of a western desert taken from the Goldfild (Nev.) News: "Another desert victim is reported, and Archie Campbell, manager of the Last Chance mining property, near Death valley, came to Goldfield yesterday to endeavor to establish the identity of the unfortunate.

"Mr. Campbell encountered the unknown man on the desert in a frightful condition. He was in the last stages of desert exhaustion, devoid of clothing, sunburned, blistered and crazed, with his tongue swollen enormously, a pitiable object, and unable to speak.

"He was tenderly conveyed to camp but kind aid came too late, for an hour after he had absorbed the first cup of water he expired."

And They Wondered!

Judge Nicholas Longworth, who used to sit on Ohio's supreme bench, looked unnaturally grave, and a neighbor, in recognition of his facial depression, named a pet owl "Judge Longworth." It was the very next day that an excited maid broke up his wife's garden party. "Oh, madam," said she. "Madam! Judge Longworth has laid an egg."

Quaint Table Manners.

Jerome S. McWade, the Duluth millionaire, talked at a dinner about the delights of a backwoods vacation.

"I go to a quaint backwoods village every summer," he said, "and numberless are the quaint people I meet there.

"Old Boucher, for instance, the janitor of the village church, is most amusing with his quaint ways. I had old Boucher to lunch one day, and the cold lobster was served with a mayonnaise sauce. When my servant offered this sauce to Boucher, the old man stuck his knife in it, took up a little on the blade, tasted it, then shook his head and said:

"'Don't choose none.'"

Another Tradition Exploded.

Two Englishmen were resting at the "Red Horse Inn" at Stratford-on-Avon. One of them discovered a print picturing a low tumbling building underneath which was printed: "The House in Which Shakespeare Was Born." Turning to his friend in mild surprise he pointed to the print. His friend exhibited equal surprise, and called a waiter, who assured them of the accuracy of the inscription.

"'Pon my word," said the observing Englishman, shaking his head dubiously, "I thought he was born in a manger!"—Success Magazine.

A Fitting Design.

"I want an estimate on 10,000 letter heads," said the professional-looking man with the silk hat.

"Any special design?" asked the engraver.

"Yes, sir," replied the caller. "In the upper left-hand corner I want a catchy cut of Patrick Henry making his memorable speech, and in distinct letters, under the cut, his soul-inspiring words, 'Give me liberty or give me death.' You see," he added, handing a card to the engraver, "I'm a divorce lawyer, and want something fitting."—Lippincott's.

The Summer Girl.

"How'd you like to be engaged to a millionaire?"

"I was engaged to one all last summer, and he seldom spent a dime. I want to be engaged to a young man who is down here for two weeks with about $300 in his roll."

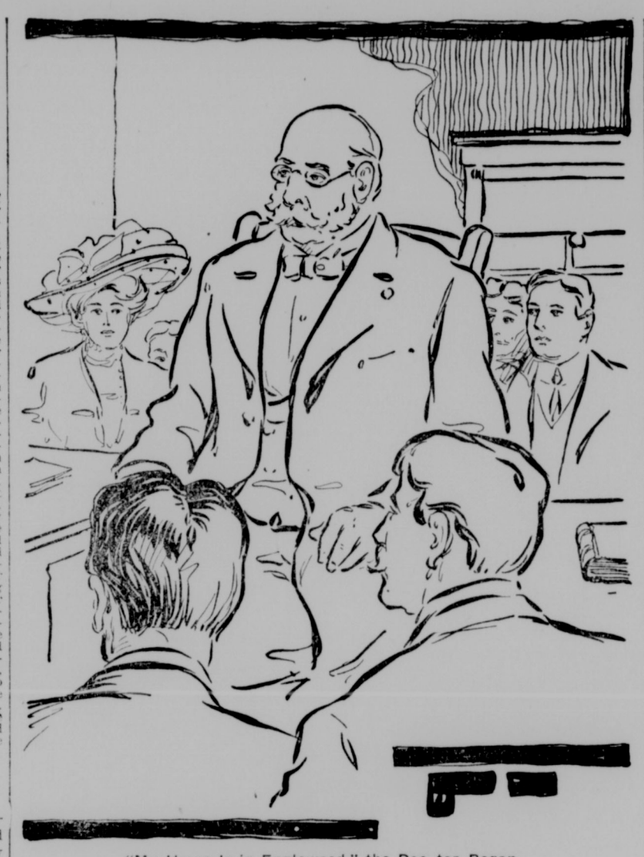
SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. Unseemly noises disturbed her during the night. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff-button in a bumper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff-button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson arrived. Gertrude revealed she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. Gertrude was suspected. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff-button. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey left in response to a telegram. Gertrude said she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him a loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong wrecked his own bank and could clear Bailey. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, was found at the lodge. The lodgekeeper said Louise and Arnold had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated. Louise told Halsey, that while she still loved him she was to marry another, and that he would despise her when he learned the whole story. It developed that Dr. Walker and Louise were to be married. A prowler was heard in the house. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase.



"My Home Is in Englewood," the Doc tor Began.

"I was not sleeping well," she began, "partly, I think, because I had slept during the afternoon. Liddy brought me some hot milk at ten o'clock and I slept until 12. Then I wakened and—I got to thinking about things, and worrying, so I could not go to sleep.

"I was wondering why I had not heard from Arnold since the—since I saw him that night at the lodge. I was afraid he was ill, because—he was to have done something for me, and he had not come back. It must have been three when I heard some one rapping. I sat up and listened, to be quite sure, and the rapping kept up. I was cautious, and I was about to call Liddy. Then suddenly I thought I knew what it was. The east entrance and circular staircase were always used by Arnold when he was out late, and sometimes, when he forgot his key, he would rap and I would go down and let him in. I thought he had come back to see me—I didn't think about the time, for his hours were always erratic. But I was afraid I was too weak to get down the stairs. The knocking kept up, and just as I was about to call Liddy, she ran through the room and out into the hall. I got up then, feeling weak and dizzy, and put on my dressing-gown. If it was Arnold, I knew I must see him.

"It was very dark everywhere, but, of course, I knew my way. I felt along for the stair-rail, and went down as quickly as I could. The knocking had stopped, and I was afraid I was too late. I got to the foot of the staircase and over to the door on to the east veranda. I had never thought of anything but that it was Arnold, until I reached the door. It was unlocked and opened about an inch. Everything was black; it was perfectly dark outside. I felt very queer and shaky. Then I thought perhaps Arnold had used his key; he did—strange things sometimes, and I turned around. Just as I reached the foot of the staircase I thought I heard some one coming. My nerves were going anyhow, there in the dark, and I could scarcely stand. I got up as far as the third or fourth step; then I felt that some one was coming toward me on the staircase. The next instant a hand met mine on the stair-rail. Some one brushed past me, and I screamed. Then I must have fainted."

That was Louise's story. There could be no doubt of its truth, and the thing that made it inexpressibly awful to me was that the poor girl had crept down to answer the summons of a brother who would never need her kindly offices again. Twice, now, without apparent cause, some one had entered the house by means of the east entrance; had apparently gone his way unhindered through the house, and gone out again as he had entered. Had this unknown visitor been there a third time, the night Arnold Armstrong was murdered? Or a fourth, the time Mr. Jamieson had locked some one in the clothes chute?

Sleep was impossible, I think, for any of us. We dispersed finally to bathe and dress, leaving Louise little the worse for her experience. But I determined that before the day was over she must know the true state of affairs. Another decision I made, and I put it into execution immediately after breakfast. I had one of the unused bedrooms in the east wing, back along the small corridor, prepared for occupancy, and from that time on Alex, the gardener, slept there. One man in that barn of a house was an absurdity, with things happening all the time, and I must say that Alex was as unobjectionable as any one could possibly have been.

The next morning, also, Halsey and I made an exhaustive examination of the circular staircase, the small entry at its foot, and the cardroom opening from it. There was no evidence of anything unusual the night before, and had we not ourselves heard the rapping noises, I should have felt that Louise's imagination had run away with her. The outer door was closed and locked, and the staircase curved above us, for all the world like any other staircase.

Halsey, who had never taken seriously my account of the night Liddy and I were there alone, was grave enough now. He examined the paneling of the wainscoting above and below the stairs, evidently looking for a secret door, and suddenly there flashed into my mind the recollection of a scrap of paper that Mr. Jamieson had found among Arnold Armstrong's effects. As nearly as possible I repeated its contents to him, while Halsey took them down in a note-book.

"I wish you had told me this before," he said, as he put the memorandum carefully away. We found nothing at all in the house, and I expected little from any examination of the porch and grounds. But as we opened the outer door something fell into the entry with a clatter. It was a cue from the billiard room.

Halsey picked it up with an exclamation.

"That's careless enough," he said. "Some of the servants have been amusing themselves."

I was far from convinced. Not one of the servants would go into that wing at night unless driven by dire necessity. And a billiard cue! As a weapon of either offense or defense it was an absurdity, unless one accepted Liddy's hypothesis of a ghost, and even then, as Halsey pointed out, a billiard-playing ghost would be a very modern evolution of an ancient institution.

That afternoon we, Gertrude, Halsey and I, attended the coroner's inquest in town. Dr. Stewart had been summoned also, it transpiring that in that early Sunday morning, when Gertrude and I had gone to our rooms, he had been called to view the body. We went, the four of us, in the machine, preferring the execrable roads to the matinee train, with half of Casanova staring at us. And on the way we decided to say nothing of Louise and her interview with her stepbrother the night he died. The girl was in trouble enough as it was.

CHAPTER XVII.

A Hint of Scandal.

In giving the gist of what happened at the inquest, I have only one excuse—to recall to the reader the events of the night of Arnold Armstrong's murder. Many things had occurred which were not brought out at the inquest and some things were told there that were new to me. Altogether, it was a gloomy affair, and the six men in the corner, who constituted the coroner's jury, were evidently the merest puppets in the hands of that all-powerful gentlemen, the coroner.

Gertrude and I sat well back, with our veils down. There were a number of people I knew: Barbara Fitzhugh, in extravagant mourning—she always went into black on the slightest provocation, because it was becoming—and Mr. Jarvis, the man who had come over from the Greenwood club the night of the murder. Mr. Harton was there, too, looking impatient as the inquest dragged, but alive to every particle of evidence. From a corner Mr. Jamieson was watching the proceedings intently.

Dr. Stewart was called first. His evidence was told briefly, and amounted to this: On the Sunday morning previous, at a quarter before five, he had been called to the telephone. The message was from a Mr. Jarvis, who asked him to come at once to Sunnyside, as there had been an accident there, and Mr. Arnold Armstrong had been shot. He dressed hastily, gathered up some instruments, and drove to Sunnyside.

He was met by Mr. Jarvis, who took him at once to the east wing. There, just as he had fallen, was the body of Arnold Armstrong. There was no need of the instruments; the man was dead. In answer to the coroner's question—no, the body had not been moved, save to turn it over. It lay at the foot of the circular staircase. Yes, he believed death had been instantaneous. The body was still somewhat warm and rigor mortis had not set in. It occurred late in cases of sudden death. No, he believed the probability of suicide might be eliminated; the wounds could have been self-inflicted, but with difficulty, and there had been no weapon found.

The doctor's examination was over, but he hesitated and cleared his throat.

"Mr. Coroner," he said, "at the risk of taking up valuable time, I would like to speak of an incident that may or may not throw some light on this matter."

The audience was alert at once.

"Kindly proceed, doctor," the coroner said.

"My home is in Englewood, two miles from Casanova," the doctor began. "In the absence of Dr. Walker, a number of Casanova people have been consulting me. A month ago—five weeks, to be exact—a woman whom I had never seen came to my office. She was in deep mourning and kept her veil down, and she brought for examination a child, a boy of six. The little fellow was ill; it looked like typhoid, and the mother was frantic. She wanted a permit to admit the youngster to the Children's hospital in town here, where I am a member of the staff, and I gave her one. The incident would have escaped me, but for a curious thing. Two days before Mr. Armstrong was shot, I was sent for to go to the Country club; some one had been struck with a golf-ball that had gone wild. It was late when I left—I was on foot, and about a mile from the club, on the Clayburg road. I met two people. They were disputing violently, and I had no difficulty in recognizing Mr. Armstrong. The woman, beyond doubt, was the one who had consulted me about the child."

At this hint of scandal, Mrs. Ogden Fitghugh sat up very straight. Jamieson was looking slightly skeptical, and the coroner made a note.

"The Children's hospital, you say, doctor?" he asked.

"Yes. But the child, who was entered as Lucien Wallace, was taken away by his mother two weeks ago. I have tried to trace them and failed."

All at once I remembered the telegram sent to Louise by some one signed F. L. W.—presumably Dr. Walker. Could the veiled woman be the Nina Carrington of the message? But it was only idle speculation. I had no way of finding out, and the inquest was proceeding.

The report of the coroner's physician came next. The post-mortem examination showed that the bullet had entered the chest in the fourth left intercostal space and had taken an oblique course downward and backward, piercing both the heart and lungs. The left lung was collapsed, and the exit point of the ball had been found in the muscles of the back to the left of the spinal column. It was improbable that such a wound had been self-inflicted, and its oblique downward course pointed to the fact that the shot had been fired from above. In other words, as the murdered man had been found dead at the foot of a staircase, it was probable that the shot had been fired by some one higher up on the stairs. There were no marks of powder. The bullet, a 38 caliber, had been found in the dead man's clothing, and was shown to the jury.

Mr. Jarvis was called next, but his testimony amounted to little. He had been summoned by telephone to Sunnyside, had come over at once with the steward and Mr. Winthrop, at present out of town. They had been admitted by the housekeeper, and had found the body lying at the foot of the staircase. He had made a search for a weapon, but there was none around. The outer entry door in the east wing had been unfastened and was open about an inch.

I had been growing more and more nervous. When the coroner called Mr. John Bailey, the room was filled with suppressed excitement. Mr. Jamieson went forward and spoke a few words to the coroner, who nodded. Then Halsey was called.

"Mr. Innes," the coroner said, "will you tell under what circumstances you saw Mr. Arnold Armstrong the night he died?"

"I saw him first at the Country club," Halsey said quietly. He was rather pale, but very composed. "I stopped there with my automobile for gasolene. Mr. Armstrong had been playing cards. When I saw him there he was coming out of the cardroom talking to Mr. John Bailey."

"The nature of the discussion—was it amicable?"

Halsey hesitated.

"They were having a dispute," he said. "I asked Mr. Bailey to leave the club with me and come to Sunnyside over Sunday."

"Isn't it a fact, Mr. Innes, that you took Mr. Bailey away from the clubhouse because you were afraid there would be blows?"

"The situation was unpleasant," Halsey said evasively.

"At that time had you any suspicion that the Traders' bank had been wrecked?"

"No."

"What occurred next?"

"Mr. Bailey and I talked in the billiard room until 2:30."

"And Mr. Arnold Armstrong came there, while you were talking?"

"Yes. He came about half-past two. He rapped at the east door, and I admitted him."

The silence in the room was intense. Mr. Jamieson's eyes never left Halsey's face.

"Will you tell us the nature of his errand?"

"He brought a telegram that had come to the club for Mr. Bailey."

"He was sober?"

"Perfectly, at that time. Not earlier."

"Was not his apparent friendliness a change from his former attitude?"

"Yes. I did not understand it."

"How long did he stay?"

"About five minutes. Then he left by the east entrance."

"What occurred then?"

"We talked for a few minutes, discussing a plan Mr. Bailey had in mind. Then I went to the stables, where I kept my car, and got it out."

"Leaving Mr. Bailey alone in the billiard room?"

"My sister was there."

Mrs. Ogden Fitzhugh had the courage to turn and eye Gertrude through her lorgnon.

"And then?"

"I took the car along the lower road, not to disturb the household. Mr. Bailey came down across the lawn, through the hedge, and got into the car on the road."

"Then you know nothing of Mr. Armstrong's movements after he left the house?"

"Nothing. I read of his death Monday evening for the first time."

"Mr. Bailey did not see him on his way across the lawn?"

"I think not. If he had seen him he would have spoken of it."

"Thank you. That is all. Miss Gertrude Innes."

Gertrude's replies were fully as concise as Halsey's. Mrs. Fitzhugh subjected her to a close inspection, commencing with her hat and ending with her shoes. I flatter myself she found nothing wrong with either her gown or her manner, but poor Gertrude's testimony was the reverse of comforting. She had been summoned, she said, by her brother, after Mr. Armstrong had gone. She had waited in the billiard room with Mr. Bailey until the automobile had been ready. Then she had locked the door at the foot of the staircase, and, taking a lamp, had accompanied Mr. Bailey to the main entrance of the house, and had watched him cross the lawn. Instead of going at once to her room, she had gone back to the billiard room for something which had been left there. The cardroom and billiard room were in darkness. She had groped around, found the article she was looking for, and was on the point of returning to her room, when she had heard some one fumbling at the lock at the east outer door. She had thought it was probably her brother, and had been about to go to the door, when she heard it open. Almost immediately there was a shot, and she had run panic-stricken through the drawing room and had roused the house.

SEAMEN ARE DRINKING LESS

Increased Sobriety as Result of Work of English Society Among Men of All Nations.

Some interesting incidents relating to temperance work among sailors of the British navy and among seamen in general have been recently given out by Secretary Matthews, of the British and Foreign Sailors' society, the headquarters of which are established in the British metropolis. This organization has over ninety years' work to its credit and stands as one of the most active and successful agents in promoting sobriety among sailors.

In furthering its purpose of administering to the social intellectual and religious needs of seamen, afloat and ashore, the society comes into helpful touch with large numbers of foreign sailors, including Japanese, Greeks, Scandinavians, French and Spanish seamen, as well as with those of native birth, and by providing rest and reading rooms, and healthful and wholesome recreative interests and environment during their period on shore are able to materially offset the temptation or tendency toward drinking habits. This good work is further extended to the ships themselves where ocean loan libraries have been established with other opportunities for improvement and recreation, apart from the influence of intoxicating drink.

Records of the work of the past year show that over 500 meetings were held on board ship during 1909, which were attended by more than six thousand seamen. More than seven thousand meetings were held on shore, which were attended by 336,146 seamen, and during the year 1,342 temperance pledges were taken. All this in addition to the long story of ships, lodging-homes, hospitals and prisons visited, and the great work of distributing helpful literature. Branches are now established in 116 ports and the wo.. is still extending.

The results of these influences show well from a temperance standpoint and are indicated in the testimony of admirals and naval officers.

Lord Charles Beresford, on the eve of leaving for his short cruise and before hauling down his flag, wrote the secretary: "I am well aware what a benefit the Rests of your society are to the men of the Royal navy and sailors in general, and the immense good they do in the maritime community in promoting sobriety and general welfare."

Sir Percy Scott, vice admiral, commanding the Second Crusier squadron, has also written a tribute to the work, stating that during the visit of the squadron to Monte Video, the local organization of the British and Foreign Sailors' society was of the greatest assistance to the men while ashore on leave, working with others, and was highly appreciated.

As an instance of the growing sobriety of the British sailor, it may be added that on the occasion just mentioned there were 6,800 men ashore daily for eight days, and not an odd police case, nor a single case of drunkenness occurred. One fact like this speaks volumes, and is worth (as to the character and conduct of the men, often under trying circumstances of treating, etc.), volumes of theories.

At the same time, on the other side of the Great Panama at Buenos Ayres, some thousand British merchant seamen were taken by train on a New Year's picnic. The local press, in reporting the outdoor sports, and the thirsty weather, etc., said: Not one sailor or fireman was seen the worse for drink." No one can doubt that much progress—socially and morally, and especially from a temperance viewpoint—has been made, all along the line of the society's work for seamen.

Stamp Out Alcoholism in Servia.

The rising tide of popular sentiment in favor of temperance appears to be spreading eastward over Europe with marked results, and now even the little kingdom of Servia is affected. The Medical Society of Servia, in common with those of surrounding countries, has been confronted by the ever increasing evils of alcoholic drinking among all classes of the people and the members have entered upon an active campaign to stamp out the blight. The question of the use of alcohol in medical practise came up for much discussion at the general meeting of the society and it was unanimously decided to address a petition to the minister of the interior asking for a permanent commission to study the question of alcoholism and the best means to employ in wiping out the evil in Servia.

Had Lost Faith In Doctors and Medicines

"I wish to thank you for the sample of Resinol Soap sent me several weeks ago," writes Mrs. M. F. Clemmer, Sunbury, Pa. "At that time my baby's face was like a raw and bleeding piece of meat. Medicine from three different physicians, besides various salves recommended by friends, all seemed to make the Eczema worse. Then another mother recommended Resinol Ointment which I procured at once, although I had no more faith in it than in the rest I had tried; but never did I spend fifty cents to better advantage. The first and second days I noticed a remarkable change, and now at the end of the third week, my pretty blue-eyed, rosy-cheeked baby is perfectly well again. I think the cure was surely something remarkable. Resinol Ointment and Soap did in three weeks what everything else failed to do in four months. My baby had been positively disfigured, now his complexion is all right again."

Resinol Ointment cures all skin troubles, from pimples to the most disfiguring eruptions and rashes. The first application stops the intense itching of Eczema, Itching Piles, Pruritus, etc., and subdues the pain of a burn or scald instantaneously. It is sold in every leading drug store in the world.

A Bernhardt Trick.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, who is supposed to be something of an artist as well as an actress, was recently called upon in one of her marvelous creations to enact the role of a sculptor, and to model a certain bust in view of the audience. This fairly electrified the critics, but when going into rhapsodies over the technical skill in handling the clay which Mme. Bernhardt exhibited they showed that they knew little of the artistic tricks of actors and actresses; as a matter of fact, she does nothing of the kind. The bust is modeled and baked, and over it is placed damp clay of the same color. This the talented actress merely pulls off, exposing the beautifully modeled head underneath.

A New Version.

Lawyers have a peculiar system of abbreviation, such words as trustees, executors being cut down to trees, exors, and admors. This practise led to an amusing slip on the part of a solicitor, who, somewhat late in life, abandoned his profession and entered the church. A few Sundays after his ordination he startled his congregation while reading the lesson by delivering one of the passages as follows: "I see men as trustees walking."

Rev. George R. Williamson's Reply To Rev. James E. Connell.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Perhaps the public expects me to reply to Rev. Connell's article in the Democrat of August 25th. Should I undertake to answer his argument my reply would be just a blank space, for he absolutely failed to produce any argument whatever. Just why his reply was published in The Democrat instead of THE REPUBLICAN is somewhat mysterious, unless he was ashamed of it and wanted it to appear where the fewest people would have an opportunity to see it.

In the beginning of this controversy when "Fairplay's" (Mr. Browning's) articles were appearing, he introduced twice the church phase of it I told him that I did not want to get into that form of discussion, feeling that it would do no good, and that strife would be the result, but warned him that if he persisted he would catch me with the "goods on." He persisted, and the public knows the result.

Before going any further I want to say publicly that I have no regrets for anything I have said. If, with this experience, I were to be drawn into another controversy of a similar nature, I would repeat all that I have said.

So I have no apology to make Mr. C. or anybody else for anything contained in my articles; and I hereby publicly reaffirm everything they contained as being historically true, and no one can successfully contradict them.

Further, there is no apology coming from the Methodist Episcopal church. It is not the church's fight. It is mine, and I can take care of all the Roman Catholic priests in the State of Maryland when it comes to the public school question. Their position is so weak, their hostility so evident, their utterances against the public school so numerous that their own words condemn them.

Now a few words in reference to Mr. Connell's last tirade against me. I am going to throw about him the mantle of charity. The whole article was a vulgar display of the most nauseating personal abuse.

He has demonstrated very clearly his utter inability to either state clearly or argue a proposition. Every point that I have made was based on quotations from Roman Catholic Popes and others in high authority in that church. But in reply he calls me a "doughty knight of the foul tongue." He goes on to suggest that fair-minded people put his articles beside mine, compare them without partiality or bias, then pass judgment on our relative honesty, truthfulness, square dealing, etc.

I most heartily recommend this myself and will be perfectly willing to abide by the verdict. I will go still further and say that I am willing to submit our articles to the sensible and fair-minded part of the Roman Catholic church and abide by their verdict as to who has played the gentleman, and produced an argument worthwhile.

Furthermore, I have never been so ungentlemanly as to make a public reference to Mr. C. from my pulpit, neither have I threatened bloodshed. Now, Mr. Connell, if you were "foul mouthed" I am going to let somebody else say so. I am not going to cast any reflection on your alma mater, for next to a man's home and church there is nothing dearer than the school from which he graduates. You have perhaps gotten as much "cheap advertising" out of this as I have, but I don't envy you your share of it.

I sincerely hope that in this school matter it may not be necessary to make any further reference to the attitude of the Roman Catholic church. If it becomes necessary I want to say that I have on hand an abundance of material, and if I have to continue it I will bring forth some information that will simply startle all liberty loving American citizens. I will publish the oath taken by Jesuit priests. Yes, Mr. Connell, I can carry this on for a whole year, and will if necessary. I positively have too good a case to let you intimidate me or cause me to keep back what ought to be said.

In closing this phase of the question I want to serve notice that I am not closing the other phase of it, namely, the public school matter. I have the right as a private citizen to either speak or write on any question that concerns the public welfare, and I shall take advantage of that right.

Our school officials are open to the severest censure, and from all indications they are getting their share. Let the good work go on until an entirely new set of officials is appointed, men who will at least give courteous attention to public demands.

The Catholic Position and the Public School System.

To the Editor of The Republican:

While sojourning in your beautiful town for four weeks, I became interested and carefully read in the "People's Forum" the last three contributions by Rev. G. R. Williamson and Rev. Jas. E. Connell, respectively. Would it be too great a demand on your hospitality to permit a mere layman, and a non-resident of your town to contribute a few lines upon the issue?

Aside from any action of the local school board, I deem the real questions are: (1) Is the Catholic Church opposed to the public schools in this country? (2) Is the Catholic Church opposed to reading the Bible either in or out of the public schools?

Firstly. The Catholic church is opposed to public schools as at present constituted, because it is the foe of non-religious schools. The Catholic church says education without religion is subversive of religion. Is it likely that a child will remain a Christian in manhood, who has not been trained in Christian Doctrine in childhood? The Catholic church says that it is most improbable. The very existence of Christianity is at stake, and the best Protestant are waking up to the fact; hence the recent Christian Educational Conventions. My opponent will reply that religion should be taught in the Sunday school. Think of it, six days a week for the acquisition of secular knowledge and a few hours a week for the Immortal Soul. This needs no argument. Religion can be instilled, says our friend, in the home. Notwithstanding all argument, experience has proved the contrary. The best disposed parents have no time for such tasks. Why pay large salaries to trained teachers of mathematics, and relegate the moral and religious instruction to the unskilled. Remember, I am not now taking issue with the non-religious. I am discussing a question of policy with a divine of a Christian church, who believes that organized Christianity must be maintained.

So much, then, for the Catholic position in the public schools. And the following figures will go to show that the position is correct. My learned and reverend antagonist says: "Sixty million Protestants in this great country says 'nay, verily'." It is here interesting to note that Mr. Williamson uses quotations marks as if he were sprinkling them from a salt caster, without the slightest regard to where they may fall, but whenever he ventures to give figures or historical data, I can prove his statements false, not intentionally so, of course. How do you get 60,000,000 of Protestants in America? The United States Census Bureau has tried to find them, but has failed. In Bulletin No. 103 (1906), Bureau of Census, on Page 14, we find that the number of "communicants or members" of all religious denominations "was 32,-936,445, of which 20,287,742, or 61.6 per cent., were returned by 164 Protestants bodies; 12,079,742, or 36.7 per cent., by the Roman Catholic church and 569,561, or 1.7 per cent., by 21 other bodies." It is up to you Mr. Williamson, to explain. Now, then, the total number of all religious bodies being 32,936,485 (1906) and the total reported population of the U. S. in 1900 being 76,303,387, we have more than 43,366,942 people in 1906 belonging apparently to no religion. Some allowance must be made for the increase in population between 1900 and 1906, not yet reported. The Census Office does not claim absolute verity for these figures, but they are close enough for the purpose of argument. From whose ranks are these forty-three million souls recruited. I can prove by statistics that they are not drawn to any extent from Catholics, but time and space will not permit. I will content myself with relating the following incident, which to my mind proves conclusively whence a large proportion comes. During the recent Sunday School convention in Washington it was reported in the public press that one of the members rose in his seat, and asked why it was that seventy-five per cent. of the Protestant boys after they get older cease to go to church. He further said that if any of the members questioned this assertion they should rise. Only one stood up. Every man of the world knows from experience that this is the statement of a fact. The Catholic church gives the answer: lack of religious instruction in public schools. The Catholic church, therefore, is not opposed to public schools, supported by the public money and under the public supervision, but she is unalterably opposed to all schools where religion does not go hand in hand with learning. Concede her attitude on this point, and the question of a division of the school fund becomes immaterial, as the same end could be reached in a number of different ways.

Secondly. Is the Catholic church opposed to the reading of the Bible either in or out of the public schools?

The Catholic church has never in all her existence been opposed to the reading of the Bible. Catholics are opposed to the reading of the King James version of the Bible either in or out of the public schools. It is not our Bible, hence we join with the Jew and non-religionists against religion in any form in our non-sectarian schools. My friend would have our schools non-sectarian schools, and still force his Bible on an unwilling majority, Jew and Gentile, as shown by the above figures. The only versions of the Bible which the Catholic church recognizes are those prepared and translated under her supervision.

At this point, my good friend inadvertently refers to Wyckliffe, Tyndale, Coverdale and King James as "Romanists," meaning Catholics, who had a hand in the preparation of the King James Bible. His purpose seems to be to make it appear that the King James Bible is the Catholic Bible. Our friend was off his guard when he mentioned these names and made the above allegation. He should have stuck to the quotation caster. Of the numerous works on the subject I refer my good friend to the Encyclopoedia Britanica, a Protestant authority, for the lives of each of the above named gentlemen. Wyckliffe, Tyndale and Coverdale wrote versions of the Bible before King James was ever dreamed of. The King James Bible came many years after, was compiled by enemies of the church and has been and is known as the Protestant Bible. Furthermore, Wyckliffe was condemned for heresy before he wrote his translation. Tyndale was condemned to death for heresy. Coverdale was among the first to join the reformers, and wrote his translation of the Bible after he left the Catholic church. You also refer to Dr. Alexander Geddes as a Catholic authority for the accuracy of your Bible. He wrote a version of the Bible which appeared in 1782, and this is what the Encyclopoedia Britanica says of it: "It was a signal for a storm of hostility on the part of both Protestants and Catholic." But to call King James I a "Romanist"! I cannot believe this was intentional, but "where ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise."

My Protestant fellow-countrymen, after this display, I refuse to discuss any of the other alleged statistics of our good friend. At any rate, time and space will not permit.

DEER PARK.

Of the various outdoor diversions planned and put in execution by the management of the Deer Park Hotel for the edification and delectation of the hotel guests straw rides have been revived and have met with distinct approval and appreciation. Taking advantage of the recent moonlight evenings several parties enjoyed them. To add to the novelty farm wagons were procured and farm teams employed, with great double harness and big red hames. One party on Friday night went in the direction of King's Run and enjoyed a good supper given in aid of the Ferndale Baptist church.

Thomas B. Davis, Jr., of New York, Josias Pennington and W. M. Kefauver, both of Baltimore, were among the week-end arrivals. Mr. Kefauver and family are hotel guests, while Messrs. Davis and Pennington occupy cottages.

Miss Maitland Marshall, daughter of General Marshall, chief engineer, United States Army, from Washington city, is enjoying the hospitality of Col. Chas. H. Heyl's family at White Oaks cottage, so also is Mr. William Strong, grandson of the late Justice Strong, of the United States Supreme Court.

Mrs. Gordon P. Paine, of Baltimore, is at her cottage entertaining Miss Ella Vaughn Patterson, of Montgomery, Ala.

Mr. Pleasants Pennington, son of Mr. and Mrs. Josias Pennington, of Baltimore, has returned to Deer Park from his Canadian fishing trip.

Miss Katherine Bonney, the Louisville belle, who has been here all summer, gave a dinner at the Deer Park Hotel on Thursday evening, having as her guests Miss Mary Mitchell, granddaughter of S. Weir Mitchell, of Philadelphia; Miss Margaret Hoopes, of Germantown; Mr. Fred Holtzman, Mr. Lorimer Graham, Mr. John Greene Kendall and Mr. Arthur Brown, all of Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas B. Davis, Jr., are entertaining Colonel and Mrs. George F. Downey and their two children, Fairfax and Faber Downey.

Quite a party arrived on Wednesday from Fairmont, W. Va., among them being Mrs. Clarence W. Watson, Mrs. A. B. Fleming, Jr., Mrs. Nina Miller Thum and Miss Helen Miller.

The following were among the guests at the Deer Park Hotel: Silver Spring, Md.—Gist Blair. Washington, D. C.—E. K. Goldsborough, W. F. Goldsborough and Miss Frances Goldsborough.

The second tennis tournament in men's doubles at the Deer Park Hotel was held last week, and again resulted in the cups being awarded to Fred Holtzman, of Washington, and James R. K. Taylor, of New York. As before, the finals proved very entertaining. The runners up were John Britton and Faber Downey, of Washington. For a while they looked like sure winners, taking the first two sets in the finals 6-0 and 9-7. However, their efforts seemed to induce fatigue, and in the third set Holtzman and Taylor came from behind and won 6-3. The last two sets were rather one-sided, going to the victors 6-0 and 6-1.

ELECTRIFYING THE FARM.

When one Benjamin Franklin afforded himself the diversion of bottling the thunderbolts of the reputed Jove he had no idea that within so short a time as has elapsed since his varied career found its termination to the present day that the use of electricity would be as general as that of water, and that among its many services to mankind would be the stimulation of farm enterprise.

Such is the case, however, and the members of the Deer Creek Farmers' Club listened with keen avidity, at its meeting at Belair, to the exposition by Mr. J. Alexander Shriver of the many uses of electricity upon the farm. They had ravishing visions of dust seeking escape from the fine old Maryland farmhouses at the behest of electricity, of carpets becoming bright that have borne the tread of generations in darkened parlors, of walls being made immaculate, of the help problem being reduced to a joke rather than a tragedy through electrical cooking and of lighting, heating and ventilation from this same source.

Then their fancy wandered to the time when electricity would stimulate seed to germinate and would garner produce as the wheat of the great cereal belts is garnered through the same agency. They indulged in dreams of everything being done with celerity while they rested beneath the shade of the old apple tree and read "The Man With the Hoe" as a piece of ancient and amusing literature.

Governor Crothers has been making hits with his farmer talks, and he has had something to say about making the farm easy for the women folks. When the electrically conducted farm is a reality the women of the rural districts will live the lives of luxury and ease. No barefooted Maud Muller will have a yearning to become the bride of the country squire, for the girls will have rings on their fingers and bells on their toes and a college education done up in fine compartmental style in their pretty craniums, with a select school pronunciation. But, of course, such things can come to perfection only in the state where most of the conditions exists for the creation of farming delights upon the electrical plan.

UNSUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT TO TAKE HIS OWN LIFE

Isaac Kitzmiller Nearly Severed Head from His Body But Still Lives.

Isaac Kitzmiller, a farmer residing on the Jesse J. Ashby farm, about two miles south of Crellin on the Yough River, made an unsuccessful attempt to take his own life Tuesday morning sometime between the hours of six and seven o'clock by cutting his throat with a pocket knife. Reports from the bedside of the man this morning are to the effect that his recovery is almost assured, notwithstanding the fact that in his attempt to end his life he severed the jugular vein and almost beheaded himself.

Mr. Kitzmiller, according to his own statement, went to his barn Tuesday morning and after attending to his stock left the building and entered the barnyard, after which his mind became a blank until he recovered consciousness at his home several hours later. Having gone to his barn before breakfast Mr. Kitzmiller's absence from the house was not remarked upon by his family until the meal was ready when Mrs. Kitzmiller sent one of the children to call her husband. The boy, going to the barnyard, found Mr. Kitzmiller lying on the ground, his face and head a mass of blood and by his side a pocket-knife with which he had cut his throat from a point close to the left jugular vein and following the jaw around immediately below his right ear. In his attempt to end his life all the muscles of his throat were severed as was also the jugular vein on his right side. A second and deeper cut on the left side of his neck grazed the left jugular and it is presumed that Mr. Kitzmiller then fainted, his head doubling down, and he fell forward which stopped the flow of blood to a great entent and which probably saved him from bleeding to death on the spot where he lay.

As soon as possible after the discovery of the man's condition was made Dr. Hinebaugh, who was summoned by telephone, hurried to his assistance and stitched up the wounds, which required several hours of nerve racking work. Within a short time after the surgeon had completed his labors consciousness returned to the man and he related the circumstances above noted. Unless blood poisoning or some other unforseen circumstance arises there is a long chance for his ultimate recovery, as the patient has been able to take and retain nourishment since yesterday morning and his condition is generally satisfactory.

Arm Fractured.

Tuesday morning the little son of Albert Bittinger at Crellin fell and sustained a fracture of his left arm. The injury was dressed by Dr. Broadwater.

STATE BOARD RULES ADVERSELY TO LOCAL BOARD

Of School Commissioners and Decided That Mr. Palmer Is Principal.

The decision of the State Board of Education, before which body Mr. U. G. Palmer, principal of the Oakland schools, and Mr. Ed. A. Browning, superintendent of the public schools of this county appeared three weeks ago, was received in Oakland last Friday morning, the Board having met and rendered its decision on Thursday at the Hotel Rennert in Baltimore.

It will be remembered that the local board dismissed Mr. Palmer as principal of the Oakland schools without cause and without having complied with the law governing dismissals and appointed in his stead Mr. H. A. Loraditch. From the action of the local board Mr. Palmer appealed to the State Board and the latter body upheld Mr. Palmer in his contention that his dismissal was illegal and the action of the school board here was therefore reversed.

The State Board further ruled that Mr. Palmer was not only pridcipal of the High School but of the grammar or elementary school, as well.

Upon receipt of decision of the State Board Mr. Palmer tendered his resignation as principal of the grammar school to the trustees who elected Mr. J. S. Sollars, of near Oakland, head of the grammar school. Mr. Sollars was vice principal of this school a number of years ago and resigned to follow agricultural pursuits. His appointment gives general satisfaction and the hope has been expressed that things generally in connection with schools in Oakland will adjust themselves.

A PREACHER-TEACHER

Will Be Principal of the Bloomington Public School.

Rev. C. L. Duncan, pastor of the Bloomington Methodist Episcopal church, holds a life certificate to teach in the Maryland public schools which is signed by the late Governor Lloyd Lowndes and Dr. E. B. Prettyman, has been appointed principal of the Bloomington public school, and his appointment was confirmed yesterday by the Board of School Commissioners.

Rev. Duncan was in Oakland yesterday in company with Mr. Jacob Stump when he met quite a number of people upon whom he left a very favorable impression as to his ability to train the the minds of his pupils-to-be. He has taught in recent years schools in many portions of Maryland and has an excellent record as an instructor.

OLD MAN ELECTROCUTED AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Samuel J. Slabach Met Sudden Death When He Grasped Live Wire.

Tuesday night at Mountain Lake Park Mr. Samuel J. Slabach met death suddenly and painlessly when he grasped a dead telephone wire which had crossed with a live electric light wire.

A few days previous to the accidental death of Mr. Slabach he had felled a tree on his lot at the Park which in falling had carried down with it a dead telephone wire. This wire became crossed with the electric line running through the Park, and was allowed to remain where it fell as no danger was anticipated. Tuesday afternoon the storm which passed over this section thoroughly soaked everything and when the current at the Park was turned on the dead wire emitted sparks and flashes of light. Mr. Slabach's attention was directed to it by a member of his family and being unaware of the great danger in grasping the wire he took hold of it with the evident intention of carrying it away. The shock which passed through his body the moment he touched the wire threw him to the ground and in his struggles the wire became wrapped around his arms and legs, the death dealing current passing through his body in every direction. For about fifteen minutes the current continued and it was impossible to release him until the electric light plant was shut down, thus shutting off the electricity, although efforts were made by a number of men to cut or break the wire.

As soon as he could be extricated he was carried into his home nearby where he died within a very few minutes.

His funeral will occur this afternoon from the Union church at Gortner and will be conducted by Rev. E. Manges, pastor of the Lutheran church in Oakland.

Mr. Slabach was one of Garrett county's best citizens. He leaves a number of children and grandchildren, besides his wife. He was about 65 years of age and was a member of the Mennonite church.

THREE FOREIGNERS INJURED AT HUTTON.

Collapse of Platform Precipitated Men Nearly Fifty Feet to Rocks.

Three men—one a Lithuanian and the others Austrians—who were employed in construction work at Hutton by B. & O. contractors, were more or less seriously injured Tuesday morning by the collapse of a platform upon which they were working, which precipitated them nearly fifty feet to the rocks and loose earth below.

The platform was caused to fall by being bumped into by a dinkey engine used by the contractors and was carried away with the men when they fell. One sustained a scalp wound five inches long; two of his ribs were broken, one of which punctured his lung. Another had his collar bone broken and the third had two holes punctured through his chin.

Drs. J. E. Legge and N. I. Broadwater attended the injured men who were later sent to a hospital in Cumberland.

REPUBLICANS TO MEET

Candidates and Managers Will Assemble in Baltimore Thursday.

Chairman Hanna of the Republican State Central Committee has invited all of the Congressional candidates and the chairmen of the respective campaign committees to meet at State headquarters in Baltimore on Thursday, the meeting being called for the purpose of discussing general political conditions and outlining a plan of campaign.

It is more than probable that the general organization will also be decided upon, the purpose being to have all the various committees working in harmony. The registration is another feature that demands attention, which work will devolve upon the district organization. The chairman of the state committee, while refraining from any interference with the management, will render such assistance as he may be called upon to furnish. This includes the assignment of speakers after the meetings have been determined upon. It is the purpose of the Republicans to be early in the field and to keep moving right along.

Communion Service.

At St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church next Sunday morning preparatory service, reception of new members and the administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In the evening at 7.30 o'clock the regular preaching service will be conducted. At Hutton preaching next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE HELD AT MT. LAKE PARK

World Wide In Its Scope and Plans Formulated to Carry on the Work.

The executive committee of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Methodist Episcopal Church, together with representatives of the Board of Foreign Missions and returned missionaries of the same denomination, held a conference at Mountain Lake Park, September 1 to 6.

The object of the conference was to study the successes and problems of the Laymen's Movement and to project plans for the field work during the coming months. Three sessions a day were held, the deliberations centering around reports presented by committees and sub-committees appointed to deal with various questions. The conviction of all those in attendance at the conference was that during the coming year the best methods of cultivating the laymen of the churches, with respect to missions, was by dealing with smaller groups of churches than were made the unit of cultivation in the great series of conventions during the years 1909-1910.

Large and lasting success, it was felt, lay in the promoting of an every-member-canvass in each church, well instructed canvassers going two-by-two, and calling at every home, by way of promoting a weekly offering for missions. Selected annual conference districts, throughout the Church, will be chosen for special cultivation by returned missionaries and secretaries of the Laymen's Movement during the year.

It is hoped that during the year perhaps one hundred strong district conventions will be held, followed by district wide church cultivation. A committee was appointed to consider the advisability of having a national convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the autum of 1911.

A fine spirit of co-operation and unified purpose pervaded the conference from the beginning to the end, the missionaries present agreeing to throw all their energies in missionary meetings and church services in the direction of the promotion of an immediate advance in the general gifts of the church for foreign missions, and for the time being laying aside the public appeal for special enterprises aboard.

Among the laymen, missionary leaders and returned missionaries present were: Bishops J. W. Bashford, of China; J. E. Robinson, of India; M. C. Harris, of Korea and Japan; divisional secretaries J. B. Trimble and J. C. Floyd; members of the executive committee of the Laymen's Missionery Movement, J. Edgar Leaycraft, chairman; Lt. Col. E. W. Halford, vice chairman; John T. Stone, treasurer; S. Earl Taylor, general secretary; C. V. Vickrey, convention secretary; F. B. Fisher, deputation secretary; Geo. Warren Brown, of St. Louis; B. C. Keagy, Frank A. Horne, Samuel R. Smith, of New York, and Chas. F. Laughlin, of Cleveland; Revs. John F. Goucher, Geo. F. Sutherland and W. E. Young, of the Young People's Department of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. W. A. Brown, of the International Sunday School Association; Mr. Chas. Fahs, editor for the Board of Foreign Missions; Rev. F. H. Sheets, of Chicago; Rev. J. Sumner Stone, of New York; Rev. Ralph W. Reeler, of Brooklyn; Rev. S. K. Arbuthnot, of Wheeling; Rev. G. Gilbert Stansell, of Paw Paw, Michigan; returned missionaries: Africa, Rev. E. H. Richards; Peru, Rev. Vernon McCombs; Japan, Rev. F. N. Scott; Korea, Revs. Geo. Heber Jones, John Z. Moore, and Geo. N. Burnick; China, Revs. Marcus L. Taft, Karl F. Kupfer, J. F. Peat, F. B. Caldwell and W. S. DWELLING BURNED AND INMATES BADLY INJURED

Home of S. O. Durst, Near Bond, Destroyed Tuesday Morning.

Between one and two o'clock Tuesday morning the home of S. O. Durst, Bond, Maryland, was destroyed by fire and his large family had difficulty in escaping with their lives.

It appears that one of the boys fell asleep while reading, upsetting the lamp, the result being that the very dry hemlock building was a mass of flames in a very few minutes. Mr. Durst had time only to call to his wife to throw the children out of the window where he and his three sons caught them.

Two of the girls and Mrs. Durst received terrible burns, the latter throwing herself headlong from the window with her hair blazing, after climbing three times over a bed to get the little ones, and no doubt she was injured by the fall, as she is a large woman. Dr. Long, of Piedmont, did all he could to alleviate their intense suffering, but he doubted very much if Mrs. Durst would live through the day, and pronounced the two girls to be in a very serious condition. Mr. Durst also was severely burned, and all were removed to the hospital at Cumberland.

The location of this house seems to be ill-fated, as a former building on this site was destroyed about five years ago, two children being burned to death.

One rather touching feature of these sad occasions is to note the feeling of brotherhood that crops out. The whole town, particularly the tender part of it, bending their energies in their anxiety to do all possible to relieve the distress.

The burned building belonged to Mr. N. U. Bond and was located on the railroad a mile from the town. The loss to Mr. Bond will be about $600 with no insurance.

LATER—Since the above was put in type news has reached Oakland to the effect that Mrs. Durst died upon reaching the hospital in Cumberland, and the two daughters, Gladys and Katharine, are in a very serious condition as well as Mr. Durst, who are being attended in the Cumberland institution.

The remains of Mrs. Durst were shipped to Swanton yesterday and the interment will occur at that place some time today. She was the mother of ten children and was forty-three years of age.

Married.

CHAMBERS—DOWLING.—On Tuesday evening, Sept. 6th, at the residence of Mrs. Elizabeth Hinebaugh, by Rev. E. Manges, Miss Agnes Rose Dowling and Mr. Charles Chambers, both of Connellsville, Pa.

SECOND STREET TO BE CONNECTED WITH STATE ROAD

Sufficient Funds have been Subscribed for the Purpose.

The first section of the new State Road leading north from Oakland is nearing completion and will be finished within the next two weeks provided weather conditions permit. With this great piece of work completed to the doors of the residents of Oakland, it was realized the gap of two blocks of the muddiest roadway in the town from the brick pavement of Second street to the new highway would be a discredit to the city as well as showing a lack of appreciation of the work done at the expense of the State at large, a subscription paper in the form of a promise to pay was recently circulated among residents and property owners generally which met with a ready response and the sum of one thousand dollars was soon pledged to the work. With this sum practically in hand a delegation of residents went before the Town Council at its meeting Monday night and a sum sufficient to bring the total to the amount required to do the work was set aside by Council and on Tuesday a committee entered into a contract with Mr. J. E. Francis to do the work which is to be a counterpart of the work already completed on the State Road and which is to be completed as soon as possible.

With these two intervening blocks improved an excellent driveway will be completed through the town and connected up with the State Road.

THE DEATH RECORD.

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. Unseemly noises disturbed her during the night. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff-button in a hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff-button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson arrived. Gertrude revealed she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. Gertrude was suspected. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff-button. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey left in response to a telegram. Gertrude said she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him a loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong wrecked his own bank and could clear Bailey. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, was found at the lodge. The lodgekeeper said Louise and Arnold had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated. Louise told Halsey, that while she still loved him she was to marry another, and that he would despise her when he learned the whole story. It developed that Dr. Walker and Louise were to be married. A prowler was heard in the house. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Louise said she had heard a knock at the door and answered it. Something brushed past her on the stairway and she fainted.

CHAPTER XVII.—Continued.

"You heard no other sound?" the coroner asked. "There was no one with Mr. Armstrong when he entered?"

"It was perfectly dark. There were no voices and I heard nothing. There was just the opening of the door, the shot, and the sound of somebody falling."

"Then, while you went through the drawing room and upstairs to alarm the household, the criminal, whoever it was, could have escaped by the east door?"

"Yes."

"Thank you. That will do."

I flatter myself that the coroner got little enough out of me. I saw Mr. Jamieson smiling to himself, and the coroner gave me up, after a time. I admitted I had found the body, said I had not known who it was until Mr. Jarvis told me, and ended by looking up at Barbara Fitzhugh and saying that in renting the house I had not expected to be involved in any family scandal. At which she turned purple.

The verdict was that Arnold Armstrong had met his death at the hands of a parson or persons unknown, and we prepared to leave. Barbara Fitzhugh flounced out without waiting to speak to me, but Mr. Harton came up, as I knew he would.

"You have decided to give up the house, I hope, Miss Innes," he said. "Mrs. Armstrong has wired me again."

"I am not going to give it up," I maintained, "until I understand some things that are puzzling me. The day that the murderer is discovered, I will leave."

"Then, judging by what I have heard, you will be back in the city very soon," he said. And I knew that he suspected the discredited cashier of the Traders' bank.

Mr. Jamieson came up to me as I was about to leave the coroner's office.

"How is your patient?" he asked with his odd little smile.

"I have no patient," I replied, startled.

"I will put it in a different way, then. How is Miss Armstrong?"

"She—she is doing very well," I stammered.

"Good," cheerfully. "And our ghost? Is it laid?"

"Mr. Jamieson," I said suddenly, "I wish you would come to Sunnyside and spend a few days there. The ghost is not laid. I want you to spend one night at least watching the circular staircase. The murder of Arnold Armstrong was a beginning, not an end."

He looked serious.

"Perhaps I can do it," he said. "I have been doing something else, but—well, I will come out to-night."

We were very silent during the trip back to Sunnyside. I watched Gertrude closely and somewhat sadly. To me there was one glaring flaw in her story, and it seemed to stand out for every one to see. Arnold Armstrong had had no key, and yet she said she had locked the east door. He must have been admitted from within the house; over and over I repeated it to myself.

That night, as gently as I could, I told Louise the story of her stepbrother's death. She sat in her big, pillow-filled chair, and heard me through without interruption. It was clear that she was shocked beyond words; if I had hoped to learn anything from her expression, I had failed. She was as much in the dark as we were.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A Hole in the Wall.

My taking the detective out to Sunnyside raised an unexpected storm of protest from Gertrude and Halsey. I was not prepared for it, and I scarcely knew how to account for it. To me Mr. Jamieson was far less formidable under my eyes, where I knew what he was doing, than he was off in the city, twisting circumstances and motives to suit himself and learning what he wished to know about events at Sunnyside in some occult way. I was glad enough to have him there, when excitements began to come thick and fast.

A new element was about to enter into affairs; Monday, or Tuesday at the latest, would find Dr. Walker back in his green and white house in the village, and Louise's attitude to him in the immediate future would signify Halsey's happiness or wretchedness, as it might turn out. Then, too, the return of her mother would mean, of course, that she would have to leave us, and I had become greatly attached to her.

From the day Mr. Jamieson came to Sunnyside, there was a subtle change in Gertrude's manner to me. It was elusive, difficult to analyze, but it was there. She was no longer frank with me, although I think her affection never wavered. At the time I laid the change to the fact that I had forbidden all communication with John Bailey, and had refused to acknowledge any engagement between the two. Gertrude spent much of her time wandering through the grounds, or taking long cross-country walks. Halsey played golf at the Country club day after day, and after Louise left, as she did the following week, Mr. Jamieson and I were much together. He played a fair game of cribbage, but he cheated at solitaire.

The night the detective arrived, Saturday, I had a talk with him. I told him of the experiences Louise Armstrong had had the night before on the circular staircase, and about the man who had so frightened Rosie on the drive. I saw that he thought the information was important, and to my suggestion that we put an additional lock on the east wing door he opposed a strong negative.

"I think it probable," he said, "that our visitor will be back again, and the thing to do is to leave things exactly as they are, to avoid rousing suspicion. Then I can watch for at least a part of each night and probably Mr. Innes will help us out. I would say as little to Thomas as possible. The old man knows more than he is willing to admit."

I suggested that Alex, the gardener, would probably be willing to help, and Mr. Jamieson undertook to make the arrangement. For one night, however, Mr. Jamieson preferred to watch alone. Apparently nothing occurred. The detective sat in absolute darkness on the lower step of the stairs, dozing, he said afterwards, now and then. Nothing could pass him in either direction, and the door in the morning remained as securely fastened as it had been the night before. And yet one of the most inexplicable occurrences of the whole affair took place that very night.

Liddy came to my room on Sunday morning with a face as long as the moral law. She laid out my things as usual, but I missed her customary garrulousness. I was not regaled with the new cook's extravagance as to eggs, and she even forbore to mention "that Jamieson," on whose arrival she had looked with silent disfavor.

"What's the matter, Liddy?" I asked at last. "Didn't you sleep last night?"

"No, ma'am," she said stiffly.

"Did you have two cups of coffee at your dinner?" I inquired.

"No, ma'm," indignantly.

I sat up and almost upset my hot water—I always take a cup of hot water with a pinch of salt, before I get up. It tones the stomach.

"Liddy Allen," I said, "stop combing that switch and tell me what is wrong with you."

Liddy heaved a sigh.

"Girl and woman," she said, "I've been with you 25 years, Miss Rachel, through good temper and bad—" the idea! and what I have taken from her in the way of sulks!—"but I guess I can't stand it any longer. My trunk's packed."

"Who packed it?" I asked, expecting from her tone to be told she had wakened to find it done by some ghostly hand.

"I did; Miss Rachel, you won't believe me when I tell you this house is haunted. Who was it fell down the clothes chute? Who was it scared Miss Louise almost into her grave?"

"I'm doing my best to find out," I said. "What in the world are you driving at?" She drew a long breath.

"There is a hole in the trunkroom wall, dug out since last night. It's big enough to put your head in, and the plaster's all over the place."

"Nonsense!" I said. "Plaster is always falling."

But Liddy clenched that.

"Just ask Alex," she said. "When he put the new cook's trunk there last night the wall was as smooth as this. This morning it's dug out, and there's plaster on the cook's trunk. Miss Rachel, you can get a dozen detectives and put one on every stair in the house, and you'll never catch anything. There's some things you can't handcuff."

There Was Something Baffling in the Girl's Eyes.

Liddy was right. As soon as I could, I went up to the trunkroom, which was directly over my bedroom. The plan of the upper story of the house was like that of the second floor, in the main. One end, however, over the east wing, had been left only roughly finished, the intention having been to convert it into a ballroom at some future time. The maids' rooms, trunkroom, and various storerooms, including a large airy linen room, opened from a long corridor, like that on the second floor. And in the trunkroom, as Liddy had said, was a fresh break in the plaster.

Not only in the plaster, but through the lathing, the aperture extended. I reached into the opening, and three feet away, perhaps, I could touch the bricks of the partition wall. For some reason the architect in building the house had left a space there that struck me, even in the surprise of the discovery, as an excellent place for a conflagration to gain headway.

"You are sure the hole was not here yesterday?" I asked Liddy, whose expression was a mixture of satisfaction and alarm. In answer she pointed to the new cook's trunk—that necessary adjunct of the migratory domestic. The top was covered with fine white plaster, as was the floor. But there were no large pieces of mortar lying around—no bits of lathing. When I mentioned this to Liddy she merely raised her eyebrows. Being quite confident that the gap was of unholy origin, she did not concern herself with such trifles as a bit of mortar and lath. No doubt they were even then heaped neatly on a gravestone in the Casanova churchyard!

I brought Mr. Jamieson up to see the hole in the wall, directly after breakfast. His expression was very odd when he looked at it, and the first thing he did was to try to discover what object, if any, such a hole could have. He got a piece of candle, and by enlarging the aperture a little was able to examine what lay beyond. The result was nil. The trunkroom, although heated by steam heat, like the rest of the house, boasted of a fireplace and mantel as well. The opening had been made between the flue and the outer wall of the house. There was revealed, however, on inspection, only the brick of the chimney on one side and the outer wall of the house on the other; in depth the space extended only to the flooring. The breach had been made about four feet from the floor, and inside were all the missing bits of plaster. It had been a methodical ghost.

It was very much of a disappointment. I had expected a secret room, at the very least, and I think even Mr. Jamieson had fancied he might at last have a clew to the mystery. There was evidently nothing more to be discovered; Liddy reported that everything was serene among the servants, and that none of them had been disturbed by the noise. The maddening thing, however, was that the nightly visitor had evidently more than one way of gaining access to the house, and we made arrangements to redouble our vigilance as to windows and doors that night.

Halsey was inclined to pooh-pooh the whole affair. He said a break in the plaster might have occurred months ago and gone unnoticed, and that the dust had probably been stirred up the day before. After all, we had to let it got at that, but we put in an uncomfortable Sunday. Gertrude went to church, and Halsey took a long walk in the morning. Louise was able to sit up, and she allowed Halsey and Liddy to assist her downstairs late in the afternoon. The east veranda was shady, green with vines and palms, cheerful with cushions and lounging chairs. We put Louise in a steamer chair, and she sat there passively enough, her hands clasped in her lap.

We were very silent. Halsey sat on the rail with a pipe, openly watching Louise, as she looked broodingly across the valley to the hills. There was something baffling in the girl's eyes; and gradually Halsey's boyish features lost their glow at seeing her about again, and settled into grim lines. He was like his father just then.

We sat until late afternoon, Halsey growing more and more moody. Shortly before six he got up and went into the house, and in a few minutes he came out and called me to the telephone. It was Anna Whitcomb, in town, and she kept me for 20 minutes, telling me the children had had the measles and how Mme. Sweeny had botched her new gown.

When I finished, Liddy was behind me, her mouth a thin line.

"I wish you would try to look cheerful, Liddy," I groaned, "your face would sour milk." But Liddy seldom replied to my gibes. She folded her lips a little tighter.

"He called her up," she said oracularly, "he called her up, and asked her to keep you at the telephone, so he could talk to Miss Louise. A thankless child is sharper than a serpent's tooth."

"Nonsense!" I said brusquely. "I might have known enough to leave them. It's a long time since you and I were in love, Liddy, and—we forget."

Liddy sniffed.

"No man ever made a fool of me," she replied virtuously.

"Well, something did," I retorted.

CHAPTER XIX.

Concerning Thomas.

"Mr. Jamieson," I said, when we found ourselves alone after dinner that night, "the inquest yesterday seemed to me the merest recapitulation of things that were already known. It developed nothing new beyond that story of Dr. Stewart's, and that was volunteered."

"An inquest is only a necessary formality, Miss Innes," he replied. "Unless a crime is committed in the open the inquest does nothing beyond getting evidence from witnesses while events are still in their minds. The police step in later. You and I both know how many important things never transpired. For instance: The dead man had no key, and yet Miss Gertrude testified to a fumbling at the lock, and then the opening of the door. The piece of evidence you mention, Dr. Stewart's story, is one of those things we have to take cautiously; the doctor has a patient who wears black and does not raise her veil. Why, it is the typical mysterious lady! Then the good doctor comes across Arnold Armstrong, who was a graceless scamp—de mortuis—what's the rest of it?—and he is quarreling with a lady in black. Behold, says the doctor, they are one and the same."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Sameness.

"There is a certain sameness about natural scenery," said the man who looks bored.

"Do you mean to compare a magnificent mountain with the broad expanse of the sea?"

"Yes. Wherever you find a spot of exceptional beauty somebody is sure to decorate it with sardine tins and biscuit boxes."

Not So Bad.

Nervous Lady—Don't your experiments frighten you terribly, professor? I hear that your assistant met with a horrible death by falling 4,000 feet from a balloon.

Professor—Oh, that report was greatly exaggerated.

Nervous Lady—Exaggerated! How?

Professor—It wasn't much more than 2,500 feet that he fell.—Puck.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

TEETOTALERS WANT A DRINK

Varieties of Beverages Do Not Meet Demand for Refreshment With Bite of Spirits.

During the recent summer weather London's cafes and restaurants made tentative displays of the stereotyped "nonalcoholic" beverages.

However, it was not warm enough to make many people sufficiently thirsty to drink them, though the fact that they were once more in evidence caused many teetotalers to complain that they were at a loss as to what to drink in winter.

"The trouble with temperance drinks," a manufacturing chemist intimately connected with "the trade" said, "is that they are either brewed—and so contain alcohol—or concoctions of incongruous materials dissolved in water mechanically aerated, and therefore necessarily lack distinction and character.

"It will probably be news to many that the law allows nonalcoholic drinks to contain 2½ per cent. of proof spirit, and practically all brewed teetotal beverages do contain it.

"Home brewed ginger ale, such as one buys at country refreshment cottages, frequently contains more alcohol than bitter beer does.

"Having dismissed such drinks as being alcoholic, there remains only the gassy bottles of variously flavored water to which different fancy names are given; or lime juice cordial and lemon squash, both lowering to the system if too freely consumed.

"No one is really satisfied with these concoctions, but the trouble is that it has not been found possible to evolve anything better.

"The fact is, no substitute for alcohol has been invented, and until some one discovers a substance with the 'bite' of spirit, but without its intoxicating qualities, the problem will remain unsolved.

"For the man who can invent a palatable teetotal drink a fortune waits, nor will the brewers be able, speaking generally, to compete against him by making and imitating his product.

"For example, a tremendous quantity of ginger wine is drunk in this country.

"The taste for this has survived from the time when every household in England made its British wines, but now, owing to the massing of the people in the towns and the want of accommodation for such work, it is manufactured by old firms, and much of it is sold to the brewers to be retailed in their tied houses.

"Notwithstanding the quantity of this brewed beverage that is drunk, the brewers do not make it themselves. The inland revenue authorities would impose many restrictions, and in most cases the articles of association of the brewing companies restrict the business carried on to the brewing of stout and beer.

"Orange wine is another British wine that has an enormous consumption in the smaller towns in the provinces, yet the brewers do not make it.

"British wines pay no duty, though they are often as strong as bottled beer.

"One firm, registered at Somerset house lately, thinks it has solved the problem by the introduction to the public of unfermented fruit juices, principally those of various grapes.

"Fruits are the finest and purest natural foods," the managing director said, "for they contain grape sugar, albumen and various valuable salts.

"These are all retained in the fruit juices, or alcohol-free wines, we sell, and we consider that fermentation of them would be injurious, for the sugar is converted to alcohol and the albumen is destroyed when fermentation takes place."

Leaders of Temperance in the Army.

United States Secretary of War Dickinson has recently followed the example of Gen. Frederick Dent Grant in publicly declaring himself on the side of total abstinence. He writes: "I believe in everything that encourages voluntary abstinence, both within and without the army. The man who abstains is better qualified to be a useful and law-abiding citizen and to promote his own happiness and that of his family and friends. One of the greatest burdens upon our country is that of crime which is the direct result of drink. When the Romans achieved their greatest success they were water drinkers."

Drink in the Subarctics.

Writing on conditions in Labrador Dr. Wilfrid T. Grenfell, the noted missionary physician of the coast, states, "A careful study of the health conditions of the coast by the doctors of our staff all these years has shown that there is no need for liquor whatever in these subarctic climates; that, on the contrary, the first man to go down in hard physical conditions is almost always the drinking man. Among men on the sea the dangers from its use are enormously enhanced."

It is always easier to talk of the divine plans than it is to do them.

It is better to learn to still the spirit within than the storm without

KEEP BABY'S SKIN CLEAR

Few parents realize how many estimable lives have been embittered and social and business success prevented by serious skin affections which so often result from the neglect of minor eruptions in infancy and childhood. With but a little care and the use of the proper emollients, baby's skin and hair may be preserved, purified and beautified, minor eruptions prevented from becoming chronic and torturing, disfiguring rashes, itchings, irritations and chafings dispelled.

To this end, nothing is so pure, so sweet, so speedily effective as the constant use of Cuticura Soap, assisted, when necessary, by Cuticura Ointment. Send to Potter Drug & Chem. The worst o' these here shepherds is, my boy, that they reg'larly turns the heads of all the young ladies about here. Lord bless their little hearts, they think it's all right, and don't know no better; but they're the wictims o' gammon, Samivel, they're the wictims o' gammon. Nothin' else, and wot aggragates me, Samivel, is to see 'em awastin' all their time and labor in making clothes for copper-colored people as don't want 'em and taking no notice of flesh-colored Christians as do. If I'd my way, Samivel, I'd just stick some o' these here lazy shepherds behind a heavy wheel-barrow, and run 'em up and down a 14-inch plank all day. That 'ud shake the nonsense out of 'em, if anythin' would.—Mr. Weller, Quoted by Charles Dickens.

Mrs. Wiggin's Idea of London.

During the recent visit of Mrs. Wiggin, the American author, in London, an interviewer called on her. With pencil poised, the interviewer asked:

"And what do you think of London, Mrs. Wiggin?"

"You remind me," answered the author cheerfully, "of the 'young lady who sat beside Dr. Gibbon at dinner. She turned to him after the soup.

"'Do, dear Dr. Gibbon,' she said, 'tell me about the decline and fall of the Roman empire.'"

Ostrich Feathers

There seems to be something irresistibly attractive to women in the fluffy, nodding plumes of the ostrich, and if this great bird could not be bred on ostrich farms his race would become extinct. Like many another wearer of fine plumage, the goddess of fashion would pursue him to the death.

Although good ostrich plumes are as costly as ever, they are in wider demand than in all the history of millinery. Everyone wants plumes, and other ostrich feathers, in all the varied beautiful mountings which the artists make them up.

There is a wonderful variety to choose from. The introduction of "willow" plumes, that is those having the flues lengthened by tying on extra pieces, has brought out all sorts of color combinations and plumes of long sweeping fibers. They are very beautiful but not as practical as the unpieced plumes. In buying high priced ostrich feathers the French plumes with long, slightly curled flues are by far the best investment. They can be cleaned and recurled at a comparatively small outlay and may be bought on a guarantee from the dealer that they will stand wear. Moisture doesn't do them any permanent harm. On the other hand the willow plume cannot be guaranteed to wear. Those in black are especially fragile, something in the dye causes them to come untied or to break off when the air is damp. The white and light colors wear better than black.

When one does not need to think of economy there are beautiful effects to be wrought out by using plumes with pieced flues, which are well worth the price.

Three fall hats are illustrated here showing the simplicity and richness of ostrich used for trimming. They are mounted in groups of three or more toward the back of the hat as a rule. Nothing else is needed on the shape and the addition of a band and bow about the crown is a matter of choice, for a shape bearing a full tuft of plumes is amply trimmed.

NEW TOUCH IN JEWELRY

Quaint Idea That Has Only Recently Made Its Appearance, and Is Welcomed.

Jewelry, at any rate, in our loose acceptance of the term, for no stones are visible in this pretty fancy. I have spoken of the gold lace pins crocheted with lace. Now far-seeing manufacturers have brought out wooden ornaments in all manner of sorts and shapes—collar pins, hat pins, belt buckles, cuff links, slipper buckles—all to be covered with this crocheted lace. One may have a whole set of them for an afternoon's work, and they make the daintiest of gifts for brides and "next Christmasers."

If crocheting is not in your line, fine lace can be darned around these wooden foundations, of dotted or figured net may be used instead. Whatever material is used, they are as quaint and pretty as the lace-covered gold pins, which is saying a great deal.—Exchange.

Few women seem to realize that bracelets over gloves are almost or quite as bad as rings over gloves. If one wears a bracelet with long gloves at all, it should be worn under them; but, if possible, it should not be worn.

It is all very well to talk about auburns and titians, but some of us do have carroty red hair and know it. In that case, we should avoid the greens and light blues usually recommended to us, and dress in black and white, in dark blues, moss greens, in an occasional yellow, and, above all, in brown—brown of every shade and description, morning, afternoon and almost evening.

General Miles, while standing in the lobby of the Arlington hotel in Washington soon after our late war with Spain, happened to overhear a remark made by an undersized young man who was standing near.

"During the Spanish war," the young man said, "I took five Spanish officers without any assistance from the army or navy."

"What's that?" asked General Miles, turning upon him abruptly. "You say you took five Spanish officers without the assistance of the army or navy?"

"That's exactly what I said, sir," replied the young man; "by myself and without any loss of blood. It happened at Boston. Here is my card. I am Reilly, the photographer. Now, if you will allow me to pose you, general—"

IMPROVED AND ADEQUATE VENTILATION FOR STABLE

Illustration Shows How Air Is Pumped From Building at All Times, Regardless of Direction in Which Wind Is Blowing

The usual method of stable ventilation is to place flues with outlets terminating in a shaft through the roof and surmounted by a plain cupola or cover with a cap a foot or so above the opening. The idea in the latter case is that the wind will blow between the cap and the top of the shaft as shown at B in the illustration herewith, says American Agriculturist. This method tends to increase the flow of vitiated air from the stable and thus aid the ventilation, pure air coming in from inlet flues placed at somewhat remote points from the outlets.

Whether this method is fully satisfactory is not certain, for at times when the wind is gusty the vitiated air is forced back into the stable instead of being drawn out, and often snow and sleet are drawn down the shaft. To overcome the uncertain working of this kind of shaft, as well as other disadvantages of the plain cupola, the style of cupola shown at C with sides opening in the direction of the prevailing winds and covered with doors hinged at the top but swinging freely, has been used with success. When there is no wind the doors hang so that the cupola is partly open on each side, but as shown in the illustration, when the wind blows from the right, the door on that side is closed by the force of the wind. The other side, however, is open and there is always a chance for the stable air to pass out and no chance for rain or snow to blow down the shaft. If desired, doors can be placed on all four sides of the cupola.

Though this arrangement is satisfactory so far as removing outdoor influences from the interior system of ventilation is concerned, the principal point is the retention of wind force to assist in ventilation when only the animal heat in the stable is available to produce ventilation. The assistance of the wind is of great service and should be taken advantage of as much as possible. A method of securing this advantage is shown in the large picture herewith. As the ventilator shaft terminates in a square, rather high cupola twice the size of the shaft. Openings of reasonable size are made opposite each other in the walls of this cupola and in line with the prevailing winds, as shown at a. Doors are made to fit these openings, connected as shown at b and hung from a crosspiece below the roof of the cupola. Near the bottom of the cupola are two or three holes about 2 inches in diameter depending on the size of the cupola. The ventilator shaft as shown at c extends above these openings but terminates slightly below the larger ventilator openings.

CHANGE SHEEP PASTURE OFTEN

Breeders Must Practice Method of Dividing Into Small Lots if Ewes and Lambs Kept Healthy.

(By W. M. KELLEY.)

The more I study the sheep business and the more carefully I note the results of my own experience and observation, the more I am coming to appreciate the frequent change of pastures for the ewes and lambs. It costs money to change our system of pasturing sheep and divide our pastures up into small lots, but we must practise this method if we succeed in in keeping our sheep and lambs free from stomach worms.

We know that these worms come from the sheep to the lambs through the grass that is eaten. We know that it takes a certain time for the germs when dropped on the grass to develop enough to get to the lambs.

That time is estimated to be from eight to 12 days. We know that the lambs are born free from parasites. We know that it is possible to keep the mothers quite free from parasites before the lambs are dropped.

By putting what facts we know together we can readily see that if we change pastures frequently, say every eight to 12 days, we will lessen the danger of the lambs becoming infected with these germs through the grass that they consume. Some of the highest authorities advise allowing the lambs to run ahead of the ewes and moving the ewes one pasture ahead each week, thus the ewes and lambs are changed every week.

Pasteurizing Milk.

To pasteurize milk or cream is simply to heat the same to about 160 degrees, then rapidly cook the liquid. By this process the lactic germs or germs which cause milk to sour are destroyed, but the germs which cause milk to become putrid are not destroyed. Experts claim the danger is that dirty milk may be pasteurized, hence the operation may be dangerous or, at least, disappointing from the reason that one cannot tell just when putrifaction may take place. The latter cannot be detected until it reaches an advanced age, as pasteurized milk or cream may never grow sour, yet may contain germs fraught with danger. Many physicians also claim that pasteurization reduces the digestibility of the milk or cream.

Currants and Gooseberries.

A. Hittinger is an extensive grower of currants and gooseberries. He lives five miles from Boston. Every plant is propagated on the farm. He has a beautiful nursery of currants, the plants being very thrifty and vigorous. Both of these fruits root readily from hardwood cuttings. They should be cut in the fall, stored in a moist cellar or buried and planted as soon as the ground can be prepared in the spring.

TERRIBLE CASE OF GRAVEL

Baker City, Ore., Man Suffered 25 Years.

Charles Kurz, 1618 Center St., Baker City, Ore., says: "For 25 years I suffered agony from gravel. So intense was the pain when the stones were passing, that I had to lie on my back and brace my feet, often being forced to scream. On one occasion two stones became lodged and I could not pass the urine for two days. I spent hundreds of dollars without relief. At last I began taking Doan's Kidney Pills. They are the only remedy that wards off these attacks."

Tuberculosis in the Prisons.

The fact that 100,000 prisoners are discharged from the jails and prisons of the country annually, and that from 10 to 15 per cent. of them have tuberculosis, makes the problem of providing special places for their treatment while they are confined a serious one. So important is the problem that the Prison association of New York in cooperation with the State Charities Aid association, is preparing to inaugurate a special campaign for the prevention of tuberculosis in the penal institutions of the state, and will seek to enlist the co-operation of all prison physicians and anti-tuberculosis societies in this work.

Women Save Money.

Women are natural money-savers, no matter how much is said about what they spend for dresses and hats. They always know how to make a dollar go the farthest. That's why thoughtful women discover that by using Easy Task soap in their laundry work they save fuel and time and trouble and health and more than that, they save the clothes that are washed. Easy Task has no rosin in it to stay in the clothes and hold the dirt with it and rot the fabric.

WESTERN CANADA'S 1910 CROPS

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Wheat Yield in Many Districts Will Be From 25 to 35 Bushels Per Acre

Land sales and homestead entries increasing. No cessation in numbers going from United States. Wonderful opportunities remain for those who intend making Canada their home. New districts being opened up for settlement. Many farmers will net, this year, $10 to $15 per acre from their wheat crop. All the advantages of old settled countries are there. Good schools, churches, splendid markets, excellent railway facilities. See the grain exhibit at the different State and some of the County fairs.

Letters similar to the following are received every day, testifying to satisfactory conditions; other districts are as favorably spoken of:

THEY SENT FOR THEIR SON.
Maidstone, Sask., Canada, Aug. 8th, 1910.
"My parents came here from Cedar Falls, Iowa, four years ago, and were so well pleased with this country they sent to Coeur d'Alene for me. I have taken up a homestead near them, and am perfectly satisfied to stop here." Leonard Douglas.

WANTS SETTLER'S RATE FOR HIS STOCK.
Stettler, Alberta, July 31st, 1910.
"Well I got up here from Forest City, Iowa, last Spring in good shape with the stock and everything. Now, I have got two boys back in Iowa yet, and I am going back there now soon to get them and another car up here this fall. What I would like to know is, if there is any chance to get a cheap rate back again, and when we return to Canada I will call at your office for our certificates."
Yours truly, H. A. Wik.

WILL MAKE HIS HOME IN CANADA.
Brainerd, Minn., Aug. 1st, 1910.
"I am going to Canada a week from today and intend to make my home there. My husband has been there six weeks and is well pleased with the country, so he wants me to come as soon as possible. He filed on a claim near Landis, Sask., and by his description of it it must be a pretty place.

My brother-in-law, Mr. Frank J. Zimmer, lives there and it was through him that we decided to locate in Canada." Yours truly,
Mrs. Richard Henry Ebinger.

TAKES HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW'S WORD FOR IT.
Taylors Falls, Minn., Aug. 7, 1910.
"I shall go to Camrose this Fall with my cattle and household goods. I got a poor crop here this year and my brother-in-law, Axel Nordstrom in Camrose, wants me to come there. He formerly lived in Wilton, North Dakota. I am going to buy or take homestead when I get there, but I do not want to travel two times there, for I take my brother-in-law's word about the country, and want to get your low rate." Yours truly,
Peter A. Nelson.

WANTS TO RETURN TO CANAD
Vesta, Minn., July 24th, 1910
"I went to Canada nine years ago and took up a quarter section of railroad land and a homestead, but my boys have never taken up any land yet. I still hold the railroad land. I had to come back to the states on account of my health. Please let me know at once if I can get the cheap rates to Ponoka, Alberta." Yours truly,
Geo. Paskewitz,
Vesta, Minn.

WHO HOBBLED THE SEX.

Now that all the daughters of Eve who wear a hobble skirt, and their numbers may be gauged by anyone who observes the sex essaying to cross a steep gutter, are up in the air so to speak, as to who is responsible for the fashion. With blissful ignorance of the part played by Americans in the counsels of Dame Fashion, the ladies had taken it as a matter of course that the hobble style came from Paris.

This confidence is badly shaken by the repudiation from that glass of current fashions. The Parisian autocrats of feminine style are a unit in denying that the halting-step costume ever was devised in the brain of a dress connoisseur of their nation. But the most crushing blow of all is the cold declaration of one of the soverigns of Parisian style that the hobble dress is not worn at all by really smart women, but is a pitiful evasions of the Parisian decrees by some American dress insurrectionists. Says another dictator: "The American women sought to hobble Paris with their absurd creation, and Paris promptly relegated it to the provinces."

The question now is, Will the American woman rise in loyalty and hobble to the defense of an American in innovation, if it is such, or will they meekly bow to the decree of Paris and get unhobbled as fast as they can perform that really difficult feat? Provincial, indeed! America to be placed upon the plane of a French province! The insinuation is too much for the sensibilities of the sex, and despite every effort to maintain the Stars and Stripes forever the ladies will, with tears of humiliation, abandon the hobble skirt with execrations upon the American innovators who deluded them into the belief that it was the latest authentic work upon style. And what a relief!

WHY NOT INVESTIGATE ELECTIONS CROOKEDNESS.

While the Governor is citing as his authority for investigating the police force of Baltimore that provision of the Constitution which says that "the Governor shall take care that the laws be executed," we would like to remind him of a respectful request to investigate alleged misconduct of election officials that he has ignored. The protest was signed by responsible persons and supported by evidence and was placed in his hands more than six months ago. Shall notoriously crooked work at elections be hushed up and all appeals for a hearing ignored and then expect anybody to believe that the so-called "investigation" of the police force is anything but the cunning scheming of a partisan Governor to promote his own personal political fortunes? Excuse us from taking any stock in the Crothers brand of reform.

SAME KIND OF DOPE.

Those stories of a complete break between Roosevelt and Taft may be put in the same class with the report that Ballinger will resign and that Uncle Joe will eliminate himself from the situation. The decision of the New York state committee to make Vice President Sherman temporary chairman of the state convention rather than ex-President Roosevelt does not indicate anything as to the attitude of President Taft toward the rival Republican factions in the Empire state. It is only in the fertile imagination of the enterprising correspondents that the President has shown a disposition to take sides in the New York quarrel.

Doubtless the reactionaries in New York have used the President's unwillingness to take sides in state political fights for their own purposes, just as the machine has done in Maryland and in other states; but it is not likely that there will be any personal break between the President and the leader of progressive Republicanism, either in New York or elsewhere.

WHAT THE CONSERVATION MOVEMENT REALLY MEANS.

President Taft's strong indorsement of States' rights, in his speech yesterday before the National Conservation Congress, should cause no confusion in the mind of the public. It is in relation to the development of water-power sites in the national domain that the issue between States and federal control has become acute, and it was his attitude toward this phase of the question which Colonel Roosevelt was watching with the light of battle in his eye. The President said he would express no opinion as between State and Federal control of these water-power sites. He was discussing quite another proposition, viz., the draining of swamp lands, owned by States or individuals, at the expense of the Federal Government, when he declared for preserving the limitations of the Constitution.

There are at present 700,000,000 acres of land in the public domains, outside of Aloska. Much of this land is covered with forests, or rich in minerals, such as coal, oil, phosophate and the precious metals. There seems to be no difficulty as to the arable lands which may be opened up for agricultural purposes. Existing laws are working well. To protect the forests and the mineral deposits, however, and to prevent them from falling into the hands of monopolists opens up a broad and difficult question. It is all the more difficult because of the two schools of thought, one of which contends that the conservation and economic development of these resources should remain in the Federal Government as a trustee of all the people of the United States, and that other school of thought, whose sentiments were expressed by the recent convention of the Governors of the Rocky Mountain States, who at a meeting in Salt Lake City contended that—

In legislatively solving the problems of conservation the National Congress adheres to the doctrine of Abraham Lincoln that the public lands are a national possession, held in trust for the maturing States.

While this question is sufficiently important in its relation to all natural resources, it becomes acute in the matter of developing the vast water powers in the public domain. If the stream is navigable, it must, under all circumstances, remain under Federal control, and yet these streams may run through lands under State control. The power cannot be developed without the use of the sites over which such States exercise control. Again, there may be nonnavigable streams, over which the States would have control, and the riparian rights might be with the Federal Government. The States are inclined to resent the suggestion that they are not able to exercise a judicious control of the development of these water powers without permitting them to fall into the hand of monopolists, and yet there is much to say in behalf of those who contend that all these natural resources should be controlled by the Federal Government in the interest, not of the States, but of all the people of the United States.

At all events, the discussion in St. Paul is one which every intelligent citizen should follow with interest and attention, in order that he may aid in reaching a proper solution of one of the great questions of the day.

"Log-Book of Four Men in a Car."

Somebody sent the Frostburg Journal last week a copy of the Moundsville (W. Va.) Echo of recent date containing the following paragraphs marked:

The National Road much of the way between Uniontown, Pa., and Cumberland comes pretty near being a national disgrace or would be if delegate Ice could have his way and put the United States government in the highway business and therefore also carry the responsibility.

That there are half-mile stretches—many of them—on the historic National Road much worse than any public road in Marshall county, is no exageration.

There are places so bad that any but a reckless driver would not go over them except for the fact that to go back would be worse, and there is always hope that there is better ahead.

Then comes stretches of perfect road, like hills on each side of the Youghiogheny river, and from Frostburg to Cumberland down through the Narrows—palisades as magnificent as the Hudson.

But to revert to the wretched condition of the National Road in eastern Fayette and Somerset county, Pa., and Garrett county, Md. County dirt roads crossing it are usually much better in appearance.

At Grantsville, Md., we talked to people who have autos and they said they never risked their cars on the National road but used them entirely in running north to the Meyersdale region and south to the Deer Park country.

In the entire length of the Road it seldom swerves from its pioneer determination to make a bee-line from Cumberland to Wheeling.

From the crest of Crooked Ridge, the highest point on the road, over 2,800 feet above sea level, the view east and west shows the narrow gray gashes of cutting in a straight line over the top of each of the half dozen mountains right in sight. Only at such places as the Savage mountains and Negro mountain is there divergence to get a better grade than directly up and down.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The board of directors of Mountain Lake Park at their meeting last week voted to allow the Millennial Dawn Society the use of their buildings and grounds for a ten day meeting September of next year. This will not only materially lengthen the season but will bring the largest crowd ever on the grounds. In order to entertain this large company the Dennet and Columbian Hotels should be put in order and extensions to other hotels and boarding houses should be made. Usually about four thousand people attend the meetings held by this society.

The Lavman's Conference closed Monday night after interesting sessions covering several days. The meetings Sunday, while large, were not as well attended as hoped on account of rain in the morning and threatening weather conditions all day. The talks by the bishops Sunday morning were inspiring and instructive.

The Good Roads Convention held its first meeting Tuesday evening and continued in session until this (Thursday) evening.

The death of Mr. Samuel Slabach about 7.30 o'clock Tuesday evening from coming in contact with a live wire near his residence on D street was a most sad affair. He was surrounded by his wife and several of his children who were powerless to aid him. See detailed account in another column.

The colored camp meeting which commenced in Faith Chapel Sunday night has not been largely attended and may come to a close before the expiration of ten days.

Mr. A. T. White has again accepted his old position with Cuppett, Leighton & Co., to the delight of his many friends in Mountain Lake Park and Loch Lynn. "Ab." is one of our most popular salesmen. He contemplates making his home on the Park side of the railroad.

Mr. P. B. Gough, who conducted the refreshment stand in Chautauqua Park this season, has again taken a position in Mr. P. T. Garthright's store. He will reside with his family in the large Bowman house near the public school building. We are pleased to have Mr. Gough and his excellent family remain with us.

Mrs. M. L. Howe, of Morgantown, W. Va., is here for a week or two.

Mr. James Howe, with the Wabash engineering corps near Meyersdale, Pa., was here Sunday with his mother.

The practice of young men and boys jumping on moving trains has again been revived and will probably be continued until some one is maimed or killed. A young man last week in attempting to board a fast moving freight train fell between the track and the curbing, and it was almost a miracle that he was not crushed beneath the wheels.

The Ladies' Civic Club contemplate an addition of one or more alleys before next season as the two alleys were inadequate to accommodate those who desire to engage in this exercise.

Mrs. Annie Rippard and daughter, of Norfolk, Va., have been spending some time here with Mrs. R.'s mother, Mrs. W. H. Gilbert.

Miss Martha Carmichael returned to the Park last week and will open her millinery store in the building near the U. B. church. She will have her opening Friday and Saturday of this week.

Mr. T. A. Devaney and family who have occupied their cottage here this season, started for New York yesterday, traveling by automobile.

Mrs. Maria Haymond, of Fairmont, W. Va., who has been here nearly every summer for a quarter of a century, left Monday for her winter home.

Mr. R. Miller, of the firm of Miller & Wilson, returned yesterday from a visit to his old home, Marietta, Ohio.

Miss Edna and Mr. Malcolm Chance are visiting their parents here, the first time they have been at home since they went east nearly a year ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Upton Cuppett are at Friendsville and neighborhood taking in the Old Soldiers' Reunion and visiting their numerous friends and relatives.

Prof. R. G. Richardson and family will take their departure for their winter home in Piedmont this week. The Professor will not take the checker champion belt with him.

Mr. Paul Sperry was here this week for a few days.

Mr. L. T. Yoder and family left for their Pittsburg home this week.

Mr. W. H. Mallette and family left for their home in Pittsburg last week.

Mr. Clarence Michael, of Pittsburg, was visiting relatives here last week.

Over one hundred of our families have installed natural gas in their cottages for heat and light.

The handsome new residence of Mr. Warren Rathbun will be completed and occupied next week.

The new residence of Mr. Doman, near his mill, will soon be completed and occupied by Mr. D. and family.

Regular church services will be resumed in the M. E. church next Sunday.

An attempt was made Wednesday morning to burglarize the hardware store of The C. M. Rathbnn Sons Co., Loch Lynn. A screen was pried from the outside of a rear window and the sash lock broken, but the burglars were evidently frightened and left, leaving the lower sash raised sufficiently to admit a person. There was no evidence that any one had entered and nothing was missing.

The same morning there was an attempt made to gain entrance to the refreshment stand, but the gentleman who sleeps there, being awakened by the noise, threatened to shoot and they made a hurried departure.

Cauliflower Being Shipped.

The celebrated variety of Allegany Mountain cauliflower grown at the Weber gardens east of Oakland, is now being cut and shipped to eastern and western markets, the bulk going to Philadelphia and Baltimore where it finds ready sale at high prices. The average cut each day since the season started has been about thirty-six barrels of first class marketable cauliflower.

CITIZENS WELL PLEASED

Frank A. Robbins' Shows Gave Two Excellent Performance.

On time as scheduled, the Frank A. Robbins' Shows treated our citizens to two of the finest performances at Miffintown, Tuesday of this week, that they have ever witnessed. All the features were first-class and the many new acts were received by applause by the large audience both afternoon and evening. The street parade at 10:30 was fine and is one of the features of these shows that no one should miss. The menagerie is exceedingly interesting and instructive, and among the animals will be found one of the largest elephants and Jumbo, the giant camel, two of the largest animals in captivity. The music by the Royal Italian Band during the performance and the concert in the evening before the show is a treat to lovers of music.

The entire management is made up of perfect gentlemen and never in the history of our town was there better behavior. The Robbins' Shows will receive a welcome return at any future time.—Juniat Tribune.

Will exhibit in Oakland Friday, September 16th.

ASHER GLADE.

During the past week we have had considerable rain, so those that had wheat ground to plow can plow it now.

A festival was held at Marklevsburg, Pa., on last Friday and Saturday evenings.

Mrs. Lloyd K. Fike, who has been very ill, is still improving.

Mr. John S. Fike and wife are both improving.

Wm. H. Thomas and son were ground hog hunting one afternoon and caught three fine pigs.

Mrs. C. A. Thomas and son Levi are extremely ill of typhoid fever.

ANOTHER VICTIM OF THE RAILROAD

Michael Carney, of Hutton, Instantly Killed Yesterday Morning.

Yesterday morning about three o'clock the lifeless remains of Michael Carney, aged a little more than twenty-seven years, who resided at Hutton with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Carney, were found by a brakeman on a west bound freight train at the water station east of Oakland, indications pointing to the fact that the young man had been killed by the train preceding the one upon which the brakeman who made the gastly discovery was working.

The body of the unfortunate man was almost entirely severed, his head and shoulders being on the inside and the trunk lying outside of the rail. The remains were taken to the Oakland station immediately after being found and later removed to the undertaking rooms of Messrs. Bolden, Brown & Weimer where they were prepared for burial and then shipped to the late home of the deceased.

The funeral will occur tomorrow morning from St. Peter's Catholic church where a High Mass will be said by the pastor, Rev. James E. Connell.

The young man was highly esteemed by all who knew him and leaves besides his parents, who are both worthy people, a number of brothers and sisters.

Mr. and Mrs. George W. Fleming and little daughter, of North Carolina, arrived in Oakland Saturday night where Mrs. Fleming and child will visit relatives during the present month. Mr. Fleming expects to return South Saturday.

Mr. C. F. Hammond returned to Oakland Tuesday morning from Atlantic City, to which point he accompanied his family last Thursday morning. Mrs. Hammond and son, Mr. Roy Hammond, will return to Oakland later in the week.

Mrs. James W. Leathers, accompanied by her grandson, Morgan Hinebaugh, and her little niece, Savilla Shingleton, went to Parkersburg, W. Va., Tuesday morning where they will be guests of relatives and friends for a week.

Try the Rock Island Battery for your automobile and telephone. Will outlast any two ordinary ones. A. D. NAYLOR & Co.

Mr. E. G. Naylor has been elected a delegate to represent St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church at the Annual Synod which meets at Smithburg, Washington county, next month. Rev. E. Manges, pastor of the church, will also attend the Synod.

Rev. Edmund Manges, Jr., returned to Oakland from Detroit, Michigan, last Wednesday night and on Sunday preached in St. Mark's church. While in Detroit Mr. Manges was engaged in church extension work and was successful in his undertaking.

Mr. Leo J. Rasche, of the editorial department of the Sentinel, departed today on a several weeks vacation, a part of which will be spent at his home in Oakland, Md., and other portions of his time will devoted to hunting and other forms of recreation along the Maryland and Pennsylvania lines of the Alleghenies.—Grafton Sentinel.

Dr. W. L. Davidson, who completed his work at the Park with the close of the Chautauqua season, left on Saturday night for Winona Lake, Indiana, where he will participate in a Bible conference similar to the one conducted at Mountain Lake Park early in the season and which is being directed by Dr. Ostrom, assisted by his corps of workers.

Mr. F. E. Rathbun, of Piedmont, who spent the summer vacation at Loch Lynn Heights with his mother, returned to Piedmont Monday to resume his position as superintendent of the public schools of that town. Last week Mr. Rathbun visited the Ohio Valley Exposition at Cincinnati and accompanied his mother to Hamilton, Ohio, where she is the guest of her sister.

FOR SALE—Several slightly used pianos of different makes, including a Stieff upright; also some organs taken in exchange. These instruments can be seen at Oakland and Mt. Lake Park and will be sold at bargains if sold soon. Write for prices and terms to CHAS. M. STIEFF, Hagerstown, Md.

A house party was given at Uplands, Deer Park, last week by Mrs. Elmer Haulenbeek and her sister-in-law, Miss Irene Haulenbeek. A merry company attended and enjoyed Uplands hospitality. Miss Mary Dean Talley, of Washington City; Mrs. Everett Thomas Fleming, of San Rafel, California, and Messrs. Geo. D. Saunders and Howard C. Thrasher, of Gassaway, West Va., being present.

Rev. Father Romanas Mattingly left yesterday for Cumberland, where he will spend a few days before leaving for his station at Amendale, Md. He has been spending a week's vacation in Frostburg. Father Mattingly is well known here. His youth was spent in Mt. Savage and he has, as a priest, spent must of his time in the parishes of Oakland, Hancock and Cumberland. His visit here brought together in friendly chat many of the older set of the town and the tales they told of the days and doings of fifty years ago were well worth time and trouble to hear. If we are to judge by the stories of these the town has become much larger and slower with each succeeding year.—Frostburg Corr. Cumberland Times.

Harvey H. Miller, a prominent farmer who lives several miles west of Grantsville, Md., accompanied his son, Fred H. Miller, and Mr. and Mrs. Len Saylor to Meyersdale Monday to see them off for Akron, O. Mrs. Saylor is a daughter of the late John Bealman. She and her husband located on a farm near Akron last fall and returned east lately on account of the illness and death of Mr. Bealman. Fred Miller returned with them to Akron with a view to securing employment there. Harvey H. Miller is one of the men who helped to rescue the three Philadelphia balloonists who descended on Negro mountain recently and got lost in the woods. Mr. Miller says the balloon was a formidable looking object as it hung in the tree tops. The natives were quite astonished and excited over the unusual spectacle.—Meyersdale Republican.

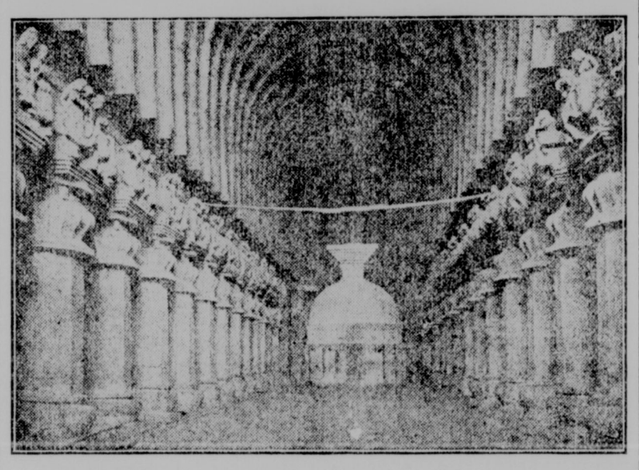
The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

Most Famous Buddhist Cave



Near Lonauli, two hours' journey from Bombay, is a famous Buddhist cave temple hewn out of the solid rock at Karli in the Western Ghauts. Its architecture strangely resembles the Gothic. This is considered one of the largest and most complete specimens off Buddhist "chaitya" in India, and its excavation is ascribed to the Maharajah Bhutia, B. C. 78. As one enters its cool dark recesses it strikes one as being not unlike a Christian church in form, consisting of a nave and side aisles terminating in an apse. Fifteen pillars separate the nave from the aisle, and the capital of each is richly ornamented with the figures of two elephants bearing a man and a woman or two female forms. Under the semi-dome and where the altar stands in our churches is the "daghoba," a dome-like structure. This was originally intended to hold relics, and the outside was formerly ornamented and draped and surmounted with a huge wooden umbrella, of which little now remains. The interior of the cave is grand and solemn and the mode of lighting perfect, an undivided volume of light coming through a single opening overhead and falling on the altar, leaving the rest in comparative obscurity. The entrance consists of three doorways and the whole end of the hall is open, forming one great window of horseshoe shape.

BIG TORTOISE OF CEYLON

The giant tortoises of the Galapagos islands and other lands are known to be exceedingly long-lived, but they probably are not older than the monster tortoise that is kept near Matara, on the Island of Ceylon. This great creature is known to have been in existence towards the end of the eighteenth century, and since then his continuous existence has been certified by successive governors of Ceylon and others.

COSTERS IN COMPETITION

American visitors at the recent international horse show at Olympia, London, were especially interested in the novel costers' competition. The donkeys, costers and donahs, attired in dresses of bright-hued colors, entered the arena to the tune of "Knocked 'em in the Old Kent Road." Many of the drivers had their clothes literally covered with "pearliest," recalling a type which is now rapidly dying out. Their presence certainly added to the picturesqueness of the show.

JILTED LOVER GOT REVENGE

A young Swiss couple at Davos were to have been married shortly, but the girl jilted her lover because he had shaved off his beard. Though he pleaded for several weeks she refused to see him or reply to his letters. Then during the night he pasted all the love letters he had received from his fiancee on the walls of her residence. In the morning a crowd collected before the house and was busily engaged in reading the letters when the fiancee discovered the affair. While a gendarme kept back the crowd, the servants, armed with brushes, soap and water, scrubbed off the love letters from the walls. "Heartless girl, I return you your letters," was written in large letters above the correspondence

VICAR HAS STRANGE CALL

Rev. Thomas Eddleston, formerly rector of High Roding, Essex, Eng., recently commenced his duties as vicar of Braintree, and in an address from the pulpit explained why he had transferred from the one living to the other, thereby sacrificing about $500 a year.

He said before he knew that the Braintree living was vacant he woke up in the middle of the night at High Roding, and heard a strange passage of Scripture ringing in his ears: "Take this child away and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages."

The vicar said he thought there must be a child in distress at High Roding, and he searched about the parish for two days to see if there was anyone being neglected, but he could find no one. Then he received the offer of the living at Braintree, and regarding it as a direct call from God, he accepted, as he considered it his duty to undertake the nursing of the children of Braintree.

DEAD MAN DRIVES ENGINE

An extraordinary incident, which might have led to a grave disaster, is reported from Paris to the effect that the driver of a train on the line from Etel to Carnac died on the footplate the other day from heart failure. His stoker noticed nothing unusual until the train was just about to enter the station, when, perceiving that the train was still traveling at a comparatively high speed, he turned to the driver, and to his astonishment found that he was standing up, leaning against the side of the cab, stone dead. He at once put on the brakes and reversed steam, and the train stopped just in time to avert a catastrophe.

WOMAN RUNS A MOUSE FARM

Why is the average woman more afraid of a mouse than of her husband's wrath over her milliner's bill? Why at the sight of a wee, inoffensive rodent, will she fly screaming to a table or chair to the accompaniment of a reckless display of hosiery? And can anybody under the sun explain why the nervy young woman who will grapple with and capture a burglar and turn him over to the police, will pull off a lovely fainting fit if anybody shouts, "Look at the mouse!"

Absolutely for the first time in befrilled womandom, a real, live and normal woman has advanced to the firing line with answers to the foregoing question. This daring woman is Miss Abbie E. C. Lathrop, the owner of a successful mouse farm at Granby, Mass. She raises yearly from 8,000 to 10,000 rats and mice for medical laboratories.

"Woman's fear of the mouse," says Miss Lathrop, "I believe dates back to the Garden of Eden. There can be no possible doubt about it, for as far back as I have been able to go in the history of the world, women have hopped, skipped and jumped at the sight of a mouse."

In her rodent family, Miss Lathrop has mice of ten different colors and 20 combinations of color. White is ordinary and black is not startling, but when it comes to cream-colored mice or orange mice, one is surprised. She also has silver, blue and agouti mice.

The red mice are much the color of the bay of a horse and the blue mouse is about the color of a maltese cat. The agouti mice have dark brown hair with yellow tips which gives a golden brown effect. Her silver mice with ruby eyes are the rarest combinations.

One of the most remarkable things about Miss Lathrop's farm is her angora cat "Tab." This feline will not allow a strange cat on the farm and she protects Miss Lathrop's rats and mice.

CULLINAN DIAMOND PENDANT

Sir Richard Soloman, on behalf of South Africa, has presented to the queen of England a large pendant made from pieces left over in the cutting of the famous Cullinan diamond that was discovered in Pretoria in 1905. It comprises two diamonds, one of 92 and the other of 62 carats, mounted in platinum. The other fragments of the famous stone, weighing ten carats each, also were given to the queen.

Summit of Beautiful Fuji

Fujiyama, the highest and most famous of the mountains of Japan, appears so repeatedly in the art of that country that it is familiar to all the world. The summit, which looks so flat and smooth from the plains below, is covered with enormous crags burnt to every color of the spectrum. In places great cliffs of slag tower a hundred feet or more above the crater's lip and completely encircle the great pit, which is more than 500 feet deep and a third of a mile across.

A GREAT INVENTOR

Activities of George Westinghouse Circle the Globe.

Genius Who Holds 15,000 Patents and Whose Air Brake Is in Universal Use on Railroad Trains of the World.

New York.—The recent retirement of George Westinghouse, for nearly twenty-five years head of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing company, recalls the career of this Napoleon of invention.

For many years the name of George Westinghouse has been a name to conjure with. The man has been a modern fulfillment of the Aladdin lamp idea. Everything he rubbed with his inventive genius became a wonder article; everything he touched turned to gold. First it was the famous air brake, that great appliance by which "he saved more lives than Napoleon lost in all his battles." Then it was the system of operating railway signals and switches by compressed air; after which came the incandescent lamp, the gas engine, the steam turbine, electrical motors and machines by the score, and a thousand other inventions that placed Mr. Westinghouse at the time of his retirement in control of the largest aggregation of patented appliances in the world. Fifteen thousand patents are filed away in his strong box. His activities circle the globe; there are Westinghouse plants in Russia, Canada, Great Britain, Germany and France. His parent plants are of course in or near Pittsburg, more especially Wilmerding.

To condense the career of this man, who ranks with Watt, Stephenson, Morse and Whitney, into a paragraph or two, the biographers tell us that he was born at Central Bridge, Schoharie county, New York, on October 6, 1846. A decade later his parents moved to Schenectady, where his father became in time connected with the prosperity class as owner of certain agricultural works. The tinkering son divided his attention between the school and the shop; when he wasn't masticating his books, he was monkeying with the buzz-saw. At fifteen he had invented and made a rotary engine. One day the notion struck him that he'd like to help Uncle Sam out in the navy. So he took a shot at the examinations and scored a hit, landing a job as assistant engineer. Before he reported for duty the Civil war had broken out. He enlisted in the Twelfth New York National Guard, re-enlisted later in the cavalry, and finally turned up on the high seas as an engineer on the gunboats Muscoota and the Stars and Stripes.

After Gettysburg was fought and won, his thirst for more education landed him in Union college. Two years there were enough for him. The magic of machinery called him away from the academic life, and he found happiness again by taking up his old work in his father's factory. It was while working there that he invented the air brake. Railroad managers who first jeered at his idea of "stopping a train with wind" had to eat humble crow. In a short time the invention was in universal use and had revolutionized railroading, as locomotives could be constructed that would travel at a high rate of speed, so long as they had that little lever in the cab, which by a single turn of the engineer's wrists would bring the train to a standstill in half its length. In the United States all railroads are compelled by law to use the device, and this was adopted by congress and everywhere around the great curve of the world the "whistle of Westinghouse" air brake is heard.

His first prominence in electricity came with his purchase from Gaulard & Gibbs of alternating electric current patents. This was in 1885, and he met great opposition from public sentiment in trying to perfect and introduce this system for lighting and power making. At the time of the Chicago world's fair in 1893 he received the contract for lighting by making a bid of $1,000,000 under others. His shop in Pittsburg soon became the place where electrical experts of the world gathered. Tesla went there and received Westinghouse's financial and practical help in developing the induction motor.

Westinghouse built the first ten great dynamos for Niagara. He also constructed the dynamos for the elevated and subway lines in New York

Nature of Divine Forgiveness

By Rev. Chas. A. Riley
Detroit, Mich.

"I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a cloud, thy sins."—Isa. 44:22.

Our best approach to this subject is by way of inquiry into the results of sin. There are two penalties attached to sin—the outward and the inward. One looks to the external consequences; the other points to the inward feelings and affections. One refers to the visible punishment, the pain and suffering that is felt; the other has to do with the guilty conscience, the closed heart of God and the separation from him. External penalty embraces all the evil consequences that are left behind and make themselves felt in the life; internal or subjective penalty is the alienation of God's affection, a disturbance of the personal relation between God and man. God is grieved and righteously angry with sin and he withdraws his approval. Now forgiveness is the restoration of this broken personal relation.

We are apt to fall into mistaken notions regarding the consequences of sin and to grieve more over the punishment than over the lack of God's approval. Yet the worst penalty of sin is to be separated from God by our own sinful desires and actions. To be out of harmony with God is really the death of deaths. To be an agent in the reversion of the moral order of the universe is to be against God and to be separated from him. This is a terrible status as between Creator and created. Yet it surely follows sin. "Your sins have separated between you and your God."

Children have keener eyes and truer hearts than we have. What is it that makes the child's face fall and the tears come to the eyes? Is it the fear of punishment or the look of trouble in the father's face? The child sees the real penalty, dreads the father's closed heart. The slave would fear the rod alone; the child dreads the unhappy relation with his father, counts a moment's chastisement small beside an indefinite period of offended, withdrawn love. The outward consequences of sin may be terrible, but it is worse to have a heart in which no trace of the Divine approval can be found. Recall also the danger, both for this life and the life to come, of alienation from God. The internal penalty is the worst.

Now, which of these penalties does forgiveness do away with? Not the external, for the sufferings in most cases remain. David was forgiven, but that did not exempt him from punishment. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall be also reap." He will reap it in his memory, in his conscience, in his weakness of will, often in his worldly position, in his reputation, sometimes in his health and in many other ways. To say that God cannot remove these consequences would be an arbitrary statement. Without a doubt, God sometimes removes the penal consequences of sin. But while such remission may accompany forgiveness, it is not at all an essential element therein. Forgiveness is the undisturbed communication of the love of God to sinful men; it restores the offender to his former position of acceptance and favor.

Legal pardon contains but a poor analogy to this inward experience. The civil magistrate may grant a pardon, but not forgiveness. He is not required to exercise a personal relation with an offender. The Bible in no instance uses legal analogy in speaking of the Divine forgiveness. It cannot be the mere remission of the penal results of sin. Deeper than that we must look. What, again, is the real penalty? As we have reasoned, it is the closing of the heart. Then the real forgiveness is taking the wanderer back again to the heart.

In other words it is a father's forgiveness. "Your heavenly father will forgive you your trespasses." In all the passages of Scripture that treat of forgiveness it is either spoken of as the Father's forgiveness, or, if these words are not used, then the fact for which fatherhood stands, namely, the love of God, is emphasized. Now a father closes his heart against and sternly holds an offending child aloof, waiting for an expression of sorrow. Lost without the father's love and earnestly desiring to regain it, the child expresses sorrow. Forgiveness is complete when the father says, "Come, you are my child again." But if one trace of disapproval remains or one fragment of the fault stands like the timbers of a dam to block the stream, the child is not forgiven. He is forgiven when the last thin film of mist between him and his father has faded away. And the Heavenly Father seals his pardon to us when he declares, "I have blotted out like a thick cloud thy sins." In the parable of the prodigal son we read: "And he fell on his neck and kissed him." Forgiveness is the open heart of God receiving the returning prodigal.

Soul Shining.

The pure in soul shall see the splendors of the divine in this life as well as in the future life. Each one of us, by shining within, can help to make this world a river of light, which shall illumine all dark places and conditions. There is a candle in every soul, but it must be lighted by our Heavenly Father in order to glow with a brilliant flame. 'Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Federal Fish Farming

By HUGH M. SMITH
U.S. DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF FISHERIES

IT WAS nearly 40 years ago that the United States government first awoke to the necessity of conserving the aquatic resources of the country, and began those operations in behalf of fishes, fishermen and fish-eaters that have now attained such gigantic proportions.

Several of the states had already established their local fish commissions or boards when in 1871 congress took the initial step toward a national fishery service by the passage of a joint resolution creating the office of commissioner of fish and fisheries.

The early years of the bureau of fisheries were devoted to an investigation of the condition of the fisheries of the Atlantic coast, Great Lakes, and other sections, to studies of the interior and coastal waters and their inhabitants, and to exploration of the off-shore fishing banks. The cultivation of useful fishes was soon taken up throughout the country and quickly attained large proportions. The natural expansion of the work was materially augmented from time to time by acts of congress, and in a comparatively short time the operations came to have a very wide scope.

From year to year, as the importance of the work has become increasingly evident, additional hatcheries have been built, the capacity of existing hatcheries has been enlarged, the scale of the operations has been extended, and new kinds of fishes have been added to the output.

Today there is scarcely a phase of aquiculture, of the fishing industry, or of biological and physical science as connected with the waters, that does not come within the purview of the bureau.

It is conceived to be the better policy to expend a small amount of public money in making fish so abundant that they can be caught without restriction and serve as cheap food for the people at large, rather than to expend a much larger sum in preventing people from catching the few fish that still remain after generations of improvidence.

Public or government fish-culture in America exceeds in extent and importance that of all other countries combined. However, the neglect of some of the states to provide the minimum protection to certain species inhabiting interstate and international waters has not only negatived the fish-cultural work of the bureau and of the states themselves, but has practically inhibited it by preventing the possibility of securing an adequate supply of eggs, thus making desirable and necessary the placing of interstate and international waters under the jurisdiction of the general government.

At the end of the first ten years of the bureau's existence, the fishes that were being regularly cultivated were shad, carp, chinook salmon, Atlantic salmon, land-locked salmon, rainbow trout, brook trout and whitefish, in addition to which the propagation of several others had been undertaken experimentally. The list now is six times as long and the annual output is ten times the aggregate for the ten-year period ending in 1881.

The main energies are devoted to the important commercial fishes—shad, whitefish, lake trout, Pacific salmons, white perch, yellow perch, cod, flatfish and the lobster, which are hatched in lots of many millions annually. More widely popular, however, are the distributions of the fishes of the interior waters which are generally classed as game fishes. Although representing only about 10 per cent. of the output of the hatcheries, this feature of the work is very important, for it supplies choice kinds of fish for public rivers, lakes and ponds and for fishing preserves and private ponds and streams in all parts of the United States. The fishes most in demand for these purposes are the land-locked salmon, the different species of trout, the grayling, the basses, the crappies, the sunfishes, and the catfishes, but various others also are handled.

Fish-cultural stations are established by special act of congress, and their location and construction are determined after a careful survey of the available sites in a given state. The usual buildings are the hatchery proper, a residence for the superintendent and his family, and necessary outbuildings. At some stations there may also be power house, foreman's or fish-culturist's dwelling, mess hall and stable.

The only permanent marine hatcheries are in Maine and Massachusetts, where the cod, pollock, flatfish, and lobsters are hatched in immense numbers. Other sea fishes that have in previous years been artificially propagated and may again come under the hand of the fish-culturist are the haddock, the scuppaug, the sheepshead, the sea bass, the mackerel, and the squeteague, some of which were hatched on the steamer Fish Hawk, in Chesapeake bay and Florida.

The fish-cultural work on the eastern coast streams was centered at six hatcheries and subhatcheries in 1909. At one of these the principal species handled is the Atlantic salmon, at four the shad, at three the yellow perch, at two the white perch, and at one the striped bass. In recent years the bureau has operated a shad hatchery on the Delaware river, and has detailed the steamer Fish Hawk for shad hatching in Maine, New Jersey, North Carolina and Florida. The central station, in Washington, is operated largely for experimental and exhibition purposes.

In order to counteract the effects of the very exhausting fisheries of the Great Lakes, the government has maintained hatcheries for many years, and now operates six belonging to the United States and two belonging to the state of Michigan. The fishes to which attention is given are those which enter most largely into the catch of the fishermen, namely, the whitefish, cisco, lake trout, and pike perch, the annual output of which now exceeds one and a half billions. Under arrangement with the Canadian authorities, two egg-collection stations for whitefish, cisco, and lake trout are maintained at points in Ontario.

While surveying a new "bank" on the coast of Alaska, the government steamer Albatross in 20 minutes made the experimental catch of cod and halibut shown in one of our illustrations. As a result of explorations of the Albatross on the Pacific coast, fisheries of great importance have been established there.

The hatcheries on the rivers and lakes of the Pacific coast are devoted almost exclusively to the various salmons. In California, where the bureau established a salmon hatchery as early as 1872, there is one central or main station, at Baird, on the McCloud river, with important collecting stations on two other tributaries of the Sacramento. In Oregon a central hatchery at Oregon City, on the Willamette river, has three subhatcheries on tributaries of the Columbia, in Oregon and Washington, and three subhatcheries on tributaries of the Rogue river, Oregon, in addition to several egg-collecting station.

The interests of the large salmon fisheries of the Puget Sound region are safeguarded by a hatchery on Baker lake, on the Skagit river.

A significant feature of artificial propagation on the Pacific seaboard is that in the Columbia basin the hatching of the acclimatized shad has begun on a small scale, and in the Sacramento basin the cultivation of the acclimatized striped bass has commenced under conditions which indicate that more eggs of this species may be obtained in California than in any of the states to which the fish is native.

The hatcheries in the interior regions constitute the most numerous class, and their output reaches the largest number of people. Their operations are addressed chiefly to the so-called "game" fishes, which, while caught mostly by anglers, nevertheless constitute an important element of the food supply. At these stations large numbers of fish are reared to the fingerling or yearling sizes before being released; for this purpose more or less extensive pond areas are required.

The fish-cultural work of the federal government has now attained a magnitude that cannot readily be comprehended, and is increasing at an exceedingly rapid rate. Especially marked has been the increase in the hatchery product during the past ten years, owing in part to the extension of operations at existing stations, and in part to greater efficiency of methods and appliances. The work during the fiscal year 1909 reached larger proportions than ever before, over three billion fish being produced and planted.

While the bureau does not lay undue stress on mere numbers and considers the vitality of the fish and the conditions under which they are planted as of paramount importance, the foregoing figures are certainly very suggestive and as a further statement of the magnitude of the fish-cultural work, it may be of interest to record that the aggregate output of the hatcheries from 1872 to 1909 was about 28 billion, of which over 13 billion represents the work of the past six years.

In making his original plans for the systematic investigation of the waters of the United States and the biological and physical problems they present, Commissioner Baird insisted that to study only the food-fishes would be of little importance, and that useful conclusions must needs rest upon a broad foundation of investigations purely scientific in character. The life history of species of economic value should be understood from beginning to end, but no less requisite is it to know the histories of the animals and plants upon which they feed or upon which their fod is nourished; the history of their enemies and friends and the friends and foes of their enemies and friends, as well as the currents, temperatures and other physical phenomena of the waters in relation to migration, reproduction and growth.

In pursuance of this policy the bureau has secured the services of many prominent men of science, and much of the progress in the artificial propagation of fishes, in the investigation of fishery problems, and in the extension of knowledge of our aquatic resources has been due men eminent as zoologists who have been associated with the work temporarily. Their services have been the services of specialists for particular problems, and through them the bureau has not only been able to give to the public the practical results of applied science, but has contributed to pure science valuable knowledge of all forms of aquatic life.

The importance to the fishing interests of the work of the bureau in connection with the economic fisheries is widely appreciated and freely acknowledged. The statistical inquiries of the bureau afford the only adequate basis for determining the condition and trend of the fisheries and the results of legislation, protection, and cultivation. Among the numerous special matters in which the bureau has benefited the fisheries the following may be mentioned:

By bringing to the attention of American fishermen new methods and new apparatus, new fisheries have sometimes been established and new fields exploited.

By the introduction of cod gill nets the winter cod fishery of New England was revolutionized. In a single season shortly after the use of such nets began a few Cape Ann (Gloucester) fishermen took by this means over 8,000,000 pounds of large-sized fish, and as much as $50,000 has sometimes been saved annually in the single item of bait.

By the dissemination of information regarding new fishing grounds important fisheries have been inaugurated. Thus when the abundance of halibut off the coast of Iceland was made known by the bureau, a fishery was begun which yielded from $70,000 to $100,000 annually to the New England fishermen.

Owing to the appalling mortality among the crews of the New England fishing vessels, caused in large part by the foundering of vessels at sea, the bureau many years ago undertook the introduction into the offshore fisheries of a type of craft which would combine large carrying capacity and great sped with enhanced safety. By correspondence, discussion in the daily press, personal interviews, exhibition of models and finally by the actual construction of a full-sized schooner (the Grampus), with the requisite qualities, the bureau was enabled to inaugurate a momentous change in the architecture of fishing vessels; so that for a long time the New England schooners have been constructed on the new lines, with a consequent minimizing of disasters and a decided increase in efficiency.

In other fisheries and regions the bureau has likewise advocated improved types of vessels and boats especially adapted to local conditions, and has published plans and specifications embodying the results of studies of the fishing flotilla of the world.

The results of the bureau's efforts in this line in saving life and property, in increasing the usefulness of the vessels, and in improving the quality of the catch as landed, cannot be estimated, but the beneficial effects may be partly appreciated when it is stated that during the ten years ending in 1883, when the old types of vessels were in use, there were lost by foundering from the port of Gloucester alone, 82 vessels, valued at more than $400,000, with their crews of 895 men, while during the ten years ending in 1907, the losses from this cause aggregated only a fourth as many vessels and men.

When Servants Were Slaves.

It hasn't been so many years since servants were practically slaves; they were bound out for a term of years and never could hope to better their conditions. The world is advancing, however, and now servants, especially those who do washing and housecleaning, are better treated. Easy Task laundry soap, that does half the work itself, and which cleans pots and pans and painted work like magic, is responsible for much of this emancipation. Only 5 cents a cake, too.

Real Modesty.

"An actor should be modest, and most actors are," said James K. Hackett at a luncheon in Pittsburg. "But I know a young actor who, at the beginning of his career, carried modesty almost too far.

"This young man inserted in all the dramatic papers a want advertisement that said:

"'Engagement wanted—small part such as dead body or outside shouts preferred.'"

Faults in American Character.

In an address on botanical education in America, Prof. W. F. Ganong remarks that "disregard of particulars and a tendency to easy generalities are fundamental faults in American character," and he insists upon the necessity of laboratory and experimental work in all scientific study. Books "ease the wits," but independent observation is the source of sound knowledge in science.

A Great Day at St. Paul's M. E. Church

To the Editor of The Republican:

People who live in close proximity to Mt. Lake Park are highly favored in that they have the opportunity from time to time of hearing some of the most distinguished speakers in both church and state. It is possible to become so accustomed to any good thing that we treat it lightly or cease to appreciate it.

This season of unusual good things brought to our local church some speakers of more than usual ability. We had early in the season Dr. Geo. W. Grannis, of New York, who spoke on the question of Sabbath observance. During the Bible Conference we were favored one Sabbath by the presence in the morning of Dr. J. W. Mahood, an evangelist of national reputation, and in the evening of the same day, Dr. A. B. Davidson, another evangelist of more than ordinary ability, preached for us.

Last Sabbath, however, was the climax of the whole season. Dr. George Heber Jones, for twenty-five years a missionary in Korea, preached at the morning hour. He told the very thrilling story of his labors in that far off land, and made very real some information regarding Korea that the congregation can never forget. The story of foreign missionary success in the last twenty-five years reads like romance. During this time there has been one convert in Korea for every hour of both night and day. The Holy Bible by an act of the Imperial Government has been made a legal text book in the more than two thousand public schools. We have churches there seating as many as two thousand people, but no church is large enough to accommodate the immense crowds that are anxious to hear the pure gospel. Dr. Jones said there is only one thing in America that approaches in enthusiasm the eager desire of the Koreans to hear the gospel and that is our mania for base ball.

It is safe to say that in importance and far-reaching results St. Paul's never had a greater service than that of last Sunday evening. Bishop Bashford of China was present and for an hour held the large audience spellbound with the more than thrilling narrative of the marvelous work of grace in China as witnessed in these last few years. The story of the home life, the social life, the educational movements, the political changes, the modern tendencies, all stood out before the people as very real accomplishments while this master pulpit genius portrayed them.

One point in particular that made a profound impression was the way in which China is dealing with the opium traffic. All right thinking people will wish that great country victory and success as she is heroically dealing with that nefarious traffic.

The exercises of the whole day were such as might be coveted by the largest metropolitan church in the great city.

This rare treat was made possible to us by being sufficiently close to the Park to secure these distinquished men. A better appreciation of the immense good done by the various attractions at Mt. Lake Park would be a very wholesome thing for the entire community.

The School Board and Superintendent Should Resign.

To the Editor of The Republican:

If the intention of the School Board to harmonize everything connected with the administration of public school matters in Oakland are fraught with honest convictions, the first move should be on the part of a majority membership of the Board as well as the Secretary and Superintendent, to tender their resignations to the proper authority. This would solve the problem and at the same time relieve the county of men who have made themselves obnoxious and who have handicapped the forward movement for school betterment. Their antagonism to the expressed will of the majority of the patrons of the Oakland schools has been frowned down upon by their superiors in office. Common decency should suggest that they resign and thus give place to other men who will at least give honest and conscientious consideration to the demands of those who patronize and support the schools.

A Victory of the People.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The decision of the State Board of Education rendered last Thursday which retains Mr. Palmer as principal of the Oakland High School, was simply and purely a victory of the people as against the little coterie of half baked politicians who hold the destinies of the children of Garrett county in their hands, as it were.

The local school board, having run things to suit themselves for so long, did not seem to be impress at all with the fact that eventually the people rule and that public opinion cannot be successfully withstood, and this latest victory of the people will tend toward the end fondly looked for when Mr. Browning and his cohorts in the school board will tender their resignations to the executive, in face of the fact that Mr. Browning has stated that he does not intend to resign, but then Mr. Browning may experience a change of heart before the matter is finally settled.

BITTINGER.

The Garrett County School Board did this village the honor of holding its last week's meeting here. Charles A. Deffinbaugh, accompanied by School Examiner E. A. Browning drove down to this place from Oakland on Tuesday evening and on Wednesday morning Commissioner Yost, of Grantsville, came up and the meeting was held at C. E. Ellithorp's.

Mrs. Annie Faithful returned to her home in Baltimere, last week, after spending a few weeks with her son, Master Robert Faithful, at the home of Michael Legeer, on Negro Mountain.

Amos H. Reckner and family of North Glade, spent last Sunday with friends in this neighborhood.

Messrs. Simon Brenneman and Asa Bittinger made a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

Rev. Young, of Salisbury, Pa., preached a very interesting sermon in the Lutheran church it this village last Sunday morning.

Miss Mary Wiley, of Westernport, is spending this week with relatives here.

Andrew J. Oester was confined to his home at the beginning of this week by a slight illness.

Master George Stark and his cousin, Oscar Hetrick, spent the early part of this week visiting in and about Oakland.

Miss Naomi Lohr, of near Oakland, was a pleasant visitor among relatives here and at Grantsville last week.

Oliver Beachy and family spent a day or two with Mrs. Beachy's mother at Deer Park last week.

Two Boys Burned Alive.

Mrs. S. A. Kendall last week received the sad intelligence of the burning to death of her little nephew, Teddy Thurber, and another little boy at Liscomb, Iowa. The two little boys were playing in a stable and are supposed to have set the hay afire with matches. Before the alarm was given the flames had cut off their escape and both perished in the burning building.

Master Thurber was the 7-year-old son of Mrs. Kendall's sister and was a very dear little fellow. His sad fate shocked Mrs. Kendall and her family very much, and Sunday evening, accompanied by her husband, Hon. S. A. Kendall, she started for Iowa to comfort her sister. Mr. Kendall after a brief stay in Liscomb will proceed to Oregon to look after some of his interests in that state. He will probably be gone several weeks.—Meyersdale Republican.

EXHIBITS OF SMALL GRAINS FOR HORTICULTURAL SHOW

Ex-Senator Brown Enthusiastic for Garrett County Showing at Society Meeting.

Garrett county, through the efforts put forth and the interest of ex-State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, has been successful at past exhibits made at the Maryland State Horticultural Show of her fruits and grains, and this year, when the apple crop is almost a total failure, it has been determined to centre all interest in making a creditable showing of small grains, such as oats, barley, wheat, rye, buckwheat, etc., and also corn.

For this purpose Senator Brown has requested THE REPUBLICAN to announce that he will be gratified if farmers will deliver to this office or at any other point in Oakland, at least half a bushel of oats weighing 40 pounds or more to the bushel which will be exhibited at the State show and later taken to Pittsburg where a sweepstakes prize has been offered which is to be awarded in December. Mr. Brown also wants samples of not less than a gallon of other small grain, such as barley, rye, buckwheat, wheat, etc., and also corn.

Grain for these exhibits should be sent in as soon as possible with the name of the grower, weight per bushel and the variety plainly indicated on a card.

Supt. Laughlin Is Relieved.

The many friends of Supt. Hice R. Laughlin will regret to learn that he has been compelled to ask to be relieved from his arduous duties for 60 days in order to recuperate his health. Mr. Laughlin has been absent from his office for some time of late, during which he has been resting at his parents' home at Deer Park. But his condition has not improved as rapidly as he hoped and he has asked and been granted a leave of absence for 60 days.

He will leave tonight for Baltimore to have his trouble thoroughly diagnosed and determined. Until that is done he has not determined just where he will go and what steps he will take. His many friends in Grafton and the hundreds of railroad men to whom Hice is familiarly known will wish him an early and complete return to health.—Grafton Sentinel.

Hartley's Aeroplane a Success.

Grafton's young aviator tried out his new machine Wednesday evening by a short flight to test the mechanism and it worked beautifully. After he started the motor the machine skimmed along the ground something less than fifty feet and then rose on its wings and flew along above the meadow in which it had been standing since being taken out for its trials. Mr. Hartley only permitted it to run above the ground a short distance as the wind was very high and he was somewhat timid about undertaking a flight in a strong wind in which to try to manipulate the machine the first time as it was so strong it threatened to turn the plane over. But the flight was sufficient to demonstrate that the machine is a go and that it will fly.

Mr. Hartley tried the machine Saturday afternoon on the Isaac Means farm at Knottsville.

WILL SAIL FOR EUROPE TUESDAY

Garrett Countains Will Spend Three Months Abroad on Business and Pleasure.

Next Monday State Senator Harvey J. Speicher and his brother, Mr. Henry Speicher, of Accident, and ex-Sheriff Austin Brown, of Oakland, will leave here for New York from which port they will sail on Tuesday for Europe where the Messrs. Speicher will go to purchase horses for import into this country, Mr. Brown accompanying them on their journey primarily to see the Europeans on their native soil and also for his health's sake.

The party will visit Belgium, France, Holland, England and probably Italy before they return to their homes.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The refreshment stand in Chautauqua Park, conducted by the Terra Alta Candy Co., closed this week after a fairly successful season. Mr. E. D. Matthews, of Terra Alta, who had charge and made many friends while here would be welcomed back next season.

The official board of the M. E. church instructed the church treasurer, Mr. H. N. Cuppett, to have natural gas installed in the furnace.

The Oakland M. E. Sunday School held their annual outing and picnic here Thursday of last week. The weather was ideal and all seemed to heartily enjoy the occasion.

The Park case which came before the court Monday went over on demurrer and will be submitted on brief within a few days.

Mrs Virginia Pierce will take up her residence in Parkersburg, W. Va., for the winter.

Mr. C. W. Hopkins returned to the Park a few days ago after a week's absence in which he visited Fairmont and Morgantown, W. Va., Cincinnati, Ohio, and Louisville, Ky., on business.

Mrs. H. N. Cuppett, who had a growth removed from her ear a few days ago, has about fully recovered from the operation, which was performed by Dr. Muncaster, the eye and ear specialist.

Mr. Doman will install a roller process in his merchant mill at Loch Lynn in time for the buckwheat trade.

Superintendent Reed will preach and conduct communion service in the M. E. church Sunday evening at 8 o'clock.

The public schools started up Tuesday in the Park and Loch Lynn with the usual attendance and with excellent teachers.

Mr. Harrison Arnold has accepted a position to travel for the Rumford Baking Powder Co.

An adjourned meeting of the Oakland District Conference is in session in the M. E. church here today.

Mr. E. L. Stone, of Wheeling, W. Va., who recently purchased the Allen cottage an G street, is putting in a bath room and later will install natural gas, mountain water and make other improvements.

Mr. A. W. Miller unloaded a car of wheat fertilizer at this station which was distributed among the progressive farmers of this neighborhood.

An important meeting of the Fairmont Construction Co. will shortly be held at the Loch Lynn hotel. Among other matters to be considered will be the establishment of a county agricultural fair and race track near the hotel.

Preaching in the M. E. church Sunday morning at 11 o'clock by the pastor, Rev. P. Z. Musgrave.

GOOD ROADS CONVENTION AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Three Days' Session Interesting and New Officers Elected.

Last Tuesday evening the Inter-State Good Roads Conference held its first meeting at 8 o'clock in the auditorium at Mt. Lake Park. Dr. John F. Goucher, of Baltimore, presided. About twenty-five delegates representing that many counties of Western Maryland and West Virginia were present. Among the most distinguished visitors were Hon. Logan W. Page, Director of Roads, representing the United States government; Hon. Chas. P. Light, Commissioner of Public Roads, representing the state of West Virginia; Col. Elihu Hutton, representing Randolph county, W. Va.; Chas. Swecker, County Road Engineer, Barber county, W. Va., and Dr. Goucher.

The evening address by Mr. Page was on "Systematic Road Construction and Maintenance." It was an able and comprehensive discussion of the subject as handled in the United States as compared with England, France, Germany and other European countries. The latter nations are far in advance of us in scientific road building. The system most prevalent with us was introduced into England in the reign of Henry VIII and abolished by Oliver Cromwell. While France has the centralized form of road building and repairs the results are superior to England's with the localized form. Maintenance is the cause of such excellent European roads rather than superior construction, and in this France excels, as her repairs are only 54 per cent as much as England's. The Americans are building some excellent roads but we are not preparing ourselves to properly maintain them.

The address was illustrated with many stereopticon views of improved and unimproved roads in all parts of the United States and Europe.

On Wednesday the Conference reassembled at 10 a. m. Dr. Goucher introduced Charles P. Light, commissioner of roads for West Virginia, who said: "The chief thing accomplished so far this year in West Virginia has been the awakening of the public relative to the necessity for correct information pertaining to the cost of correctly maintaining our roads. Education, information and agitation are equally important in sensibly solving this most absorbing problem. Much work of practical nature has been done in a number of our counties in demonstrating the value of the split log drag as an earth road maintainer."

George C. Baker, road engineer, of Morgantown, was the second speaker and led a general discussion. Joseph Whitney Shirley, of Baltimore city, explained what is being done with the city's share of the $5,000,000 good roads fund, contending for low grade, wide well located, thoroughly drained and permanently constructed thoroughfares.

Colonel Hutton, who lives about midway between Staunton and Parkersburg, on the old Virginia turnpike, constructed by the state 75 years ago, and on which there is no grade exceeding five degrees, spoke enthusiastically of the great usefulness and permanence of that highway, although it was expensive to build. Elmer Hough, of Wellsburg, W. Va., contended that in actual permanent road building there are three great points to be considered, viz.: Proper drainage, proper material and the foundation below frost line. County Commissioner Wilson, of Harford county, said that because of improper construction with reference to drainage it would cost as high of $700 or $800 per mile this year to maintain some sections of the Shoemaker roads in his county. The discussion became so interesting that an adjournment was not taken until 12:30.

The conference convened again at 1:45 and continued the discussion of the general subject of road-building for the next hour, and it was with difficulty that an adjournment was effected at 3 p. m. This discussion became general, individuals asking and answering questions freely. Engineer Wilson, of Preston county, which has 1,200 miles of highways, advocated the building of one great trunk road by the co-operation of the adjoining counties and states and then in time numerous lateral lines by the counties. R. B. Naylor, of Wheeling, described the excellent results being accomplished in Ohio county by the co-operation and support of the general public and the many miles of the highest type of road already constructed. Ex-Engineer Hough, of Brook county, gave the plans, about perfected, for building a 60-foot boulevard, 16 miles long, to connect Wellsboro and Wheeling.

Commissioner Light, of West Virginia, by specific and personal questions, drew out the fact that one of the cheapest and most effective means of maintaining dirt roads through clay and similar soils is by the use of the split log drag.

Other speakers were M. J. Grove, of Limekiln; Mr. McKenzie, of Garrett, and Otto Hoing, of Frostburg.

For the ensuing year the following officers were elected: President, R. B. Naylor, Wheeling; first vice president, J. W. Shirley, Baltimore; second vice president, Col. Elihu Hutton, Huttonsville, W. Va.; third vice president, Jos. D. Baker, Frederick; fourth vice president, George C. Baker, Morgantown; fifth vice president, S. T. Jones, Oakland; corresponding secretary, W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park; recording secretary, Lieut. E. S. West, Oakland; treasurer, D. M. Dixon, Oakland; executive committee, Howard Sutherland, Elkins; A. N. Wilson, Perryman, Md.; Elmer Hough, Wellsburg, W. Va.; G. S. Hamill, Oakland; Charles P. Light, Charleston.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. J. L. AUGUSTINE.

The of death of Mrs. J. L. Augustine at her home near Grantsville, on Tuesday morning Sept. 6, caused sorrow and grief in the neighborhood where she was loved and respected by all who knew her. About four weeks ago she was stricken with typhoid fever and, owing to her advanced years and the presence of other complications, she succumbed to the ravishes of the disease. She was almost 70 years old and leaves a husband and three daughters—Mrs. Peter Royer of Loysville, Pa.; Mrs. John Inglehart, Accident, Md., and Mrs. H. M. Strickner, San Francisco, Cal., to mourn her loss.

MRS. RACHEL BROADWATER.

Saturday, September 3, 1910, at the family seat in New Germany, died Mrs. Rachel Broadwater, in the eighty-sixth year of her age. The subject of this sketch was born in an ancient homestead not over two miles from the place of her death. There at the eastern base of Meadow Mountain Rachel Ogg first saw the light December 9, 1824. Before attaining the age of seventeen she became a member of the German Baptist church, and through the long span of subsequent years walked as unwaveringly by faith in His steps as mortal can follow the Divine. After laying the unalterable foundation of her religious life, March 6, 1842, she was united in marriage to Mr. Henry Broadwater. This proved to be a marriage of congenial lives until the death of Mr. Broadwater March 3, 1898. After marriage they braved the wilds of a mountain forest and by unfagging industry carved from it one of the best appointed and most productive farms of Garrett. From this union sprang five sons and six daughters—Mrs. Elizabeth Bittinger, Mrs. Rebecca Bittinger, Jonathan, of Fillmore county, Minnesota; Mrs. Martha Gregg, Perry, George W., Mrs. Mahala Ellithorp, Mrs. Mary Yommer, Samuel E., Solomon, who died at the age of four years, and Mrs. Rachel J. Boucher, of Glade, Pennsylvania. All are married and residents of Garrett county save the one dead and the two as above mentioned in other states. Ten or more years prior to the death of Mr. Broadwater, his residence was destroyed by fire, and from that fire Mrs. Broadwater was subjected to a shock and strain from which, perhaps, she never recovered. In recent years she had a partial stroke of paralysis, a renewal of which terminated fatally the date as above given. The interment was made in the home cemetery by the side of her husband Sunday afternoon following her death.

This long career was marked by extraordinary activity, usefulness and good deeds. A devoted wife, mother and friend, given by providence a sound mind in a healthy body, she dispensed an influence and swayed a control over her house and children not possible except from so admirable a character as was hers. In the family domain she was a manager of rare gifts, training her children in righteous walks and useful ways. She was an exception among mothers in the diplomacy of enforcing counsel without friction. She watched the growth and directed the habits of her children with an intelligent solicitude that could not well fail to leave a salutary impress upon each child's character. Her hospitality was warm and her heart responsive to the needs of others. The first time it was my privilege to meet her she had just taken charge of an infant left motherless by death, and for nearly twenty years she tenderly cared for that child and saw it reach womanhood and marriage.

Her life covered a long period checkered by lights and shadows, and she felt that she had been left to linger after loved ones of her day and time had gone. Yet it was graciously granted her to have a sweet and serene autumn evening for the setting of the sun to dawn over the kingdom not made by hands. RELLIM.

FRIENDSVILLE.

First of all, "How do you do." This is our introduction, but if the editor and his staff can put up with our poor efforts we shall try to send the local news each week from our little city.

We are just recovering from our exertions in helping, like the rest of the good people here, to give the thousands that attended our big doings here last week a good time. Our people enjoyed the concerts given here by the Oakland Band. Oakland can well be proud of such an organization.

Mrs. Salathiel Savage has been quite ill. We trust she may soon recover.

The M. E. church has decided to put down cement sidewalks. The west side of town is great for cement walks.

A little daughter of Lloyd Linninger choked to death on an apple core last Saturday. Interment was held Monday at Chestnut avenue. The parents have the deepest sympathy of the community.

Mrs. Hattie Guard left Sunday for Clarksburg, via Oakland, where she will visit her daughter who has been very sick.

School commenced this week and we look forward to a successful term with the teachers that have been engaged.

We are glad to hear from our neighboring town, Accident, that they are doing so well in raising money for the new road, and it is now plain to see that the road is an assured fact. How much good this will be can hardly be realized by the citizens in the vicinity of it.

The little town of Confluence did not contribute many people to the big gathering of the Blue and the Gray, as we hear they had some kind of a little time themselves on Friday, but that did not make any difference here, for the town was crowded anyway.

A COUNTY AGRICULTURAL FAIR NEAR OAKLAND

Parties Interested In Such Enterprise Invited to Attend Meeting Saturday.

Prominent men from Fairmont, W. Va., are interested in establishing an agricultural fair, stock show and race course in the vicinity of Oakland and these gentlemen desire to meet all interested parties in Garrett county at the court house Saturday afternoon, September 17th, at three o'clock for the purpose of organizing and getting the matter under way at the earliest possible date.

It is proposed that this fair shall be held during the latter part of September each year in order to prolong the season. This will be at a time when the agricultural products of this county shall have matured sufficiently to exhibit and it is hoped that a large number of Garrett countians will be present at the meeting on Saturday, for nothing obtainable at this time could mean more to Garrett county by way of stimulating interest in scientific farming, stock raising, etc., than a good county fair. It will also mean much to this county from an advertising point of view. Her possibilities will be brought to the attention of the State and the adjoining States.

It is hoped there will be no doubting Thomases present at the meeting, but that everybody will come prepared to boost this proposed enterprise and lend at least moral, if not material, support.

The interested Fairmonters are men financially able to take care of the enterprise and it is up to the local people to say whether or not the fair is to be established.

How did our Band look in the big parade? Boys, we are proud of you and if you keep on you will be one of the finest some of these days.

The case of Shartzer vs. Guard was decided by Judge Boyd on Monday in favor of the defendent, C. V. Guard, who was sued for malicious arrest by John Shartzer. The Judge ruled that the acting Mayor did not overstep his authority, and that the laws must be obeyed and enforced and that the Council had a perfect right to make such laws for the benefit of the citizens of the town. Among those attending Court on Monday were Messrs. C. V. Guard, H. J. Black, W. F. East, M. E. Frazee, R. M. Holman, Leon Hardie, J. F. Garey and L. M. Welch.

Last week was the biggest in Friendsville's history. From fifteen hundred to two thousand visitors attended the celebration. The parade was the best and the largest ever held here. The town was tastefully decorated, the triumphiant arch on Maple street being a beautiful and massive creation of the artist. The floats in the parade were of all kinds from a pony cart to a reproduction of one of the large stores. To name them all would be too long and to name some not fair. The veterans looked fine. Marching side by side were the Blue and the Gray and they received round after round of applause from the throngs of sight-seers.

The following is a list of the Federal soldiers who attended the reunion: R. E. Friend, B. F. Friend, Elijah Friend, E. M. Friend, Wm. H. H. Friend, W. S. Friend, W. H. Frey, Wm. A. Garnett, Chas. Kirkwood, John C. Donald, Joseph Timmins, B. H. Warner, Sr., Geo. E. Bishoff, Perry Frantz, H. E. Friend, Chas. A. Friend, John Bowman, Geo. E. Frantz, J. M. Lowdermilk, E. J. Hartshorn, Samuel Faulkner, John A. Sowers, R. T. Browning, Geo. W. Cover, Samuel Vansickle, H. G. Sanders, J. T. Garey, Isaiah Friend, T. H. Cuppett, D. A. Fraker, Alfred Jenkins, Salathiel Savage, Elisha Teats, David S. Feathers, David A. Friend, Andrew Grice, Alex. G. Pringle, Edward Margroff, Wm. J. Railey

The Confederates were C. M. Miller, W. D. Hoye, James Leathers, Dr. Greenwood.

ROBINSON CRUSOE

To Be Presented By Frank S. Davidson Assisted By Local Talent.

Frank S. Davidson, the well known comedian, assisted by the following local favorites: Misses Mary Broderick, Veronica Rasche and Edith Ault and Messrs. William Lawton, James E. Verma, Lawrence Fraley, Charles A. Tower, B. F. Selby and Bennie Kildow, will produce that immortal story of the sea, "Robinson Crusoe," on Friday evening, September 23rd, 1910, in Beckwith's Opera House, Oakland, Maryland. Proceeds are for the benefit of the Oakland Concert Band and the house should be crowded.

No expense is being spared in making this the most complete local performance ever attempted here.

Mr. Davidson brings with him all of the mechanical effects and over one thousand square yards of scenery.

During the play a score of jolly, jingling songs of the sea will be sung by a charming chorus of girls.

Get your seats early. The songs, dances, electrical and scenic effects, which will be seen and heard at this show, will be worth the price of admission alone. A full masted schooner will be seen on this stage for the first time. Seats on sale at Harned's Drug store.

Stanton Reunion.

The old mill-dam, along the Casselman river, a mile east of Grantsville, was the scene of much merry-making Monday, when nearly all this generation of Stantons, including Louis Stanton and family, of this place, were gathered on its banks. The "Little Crossings Mill," for years associated with the name of Stanton, seemed an eminently fitting place to hold the reunion and men, women and children enjoyed to the utmost the delicious repast served at noon-day, to which each family contributed. In the afternoon games were played and canoeing and boating were indulged in, and when the shadows of evening began to gather each family returned to their home happier because of a day spent with their own kin. The only circumstance which saddened an otherwise perfect day was the absence of the late Eli Stanton, founder of the mill, whose death occurred a few months ago.—Frostburg Journal.

New Law Firm.

Messrs. George W. Legge, Jr., and Stuart F. Hamill, both excellent young men and well versed in law, have formed a co-partnership for the practice of their profession and will open offices in the new Nally building as soon as it is completed. The new firm, in addition to the law practice which they will soon build up, will handle insurance, bonds, etc. Their many friends wish for them a successful business career.

THE CIRCULAR STAIRCASE

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. Unseemly noises disturbed her during the night. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff-button in a hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff-button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson arrived. Gertrude revealed she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. Gertrude was suspected. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff-button. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey left in response to a telegram. Gertrude said she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him a loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong wrecked his own bank and could clear Bailey. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, was found at the lodge. The lodgekeeper said Louise and Arnold had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated. Louise told Halsey, that while she still loved him she was to marry another, and that he would despise her when he learned the whole story. It developed that Dr. Walker and Louise were to be married. A prowler was heard in the house. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Louise said she had heard a knock at the door and answered it. Something brushed past her on the stairway and she fainted. Bailey is suspected of Armstrong's murder.

It Was Thomas.

"Why was Mr. Bailey not present at the inquest?"

The detective's expression was peculiar.

"Because his physician testified that he is ill, and unable to leave his bed."

"Ill!" I exclaimed. "Why, neither Halsey nor Gertrude has told me that."

"There are more things than that, Miss Innes, that are puzzling. Bailey gives the impression that he knew nothing of the crash at the bank until he read it in the paper Monday night, and that he went back and surrendered himself immediately. I do not believe it. Jonas, the watchman at the Traders' bank, tells a different story. He says that on the Thursday night before, about 8:30, Bailey went back to the bank. Jonas admitted him, and he says the cashier was in a state almost of collapse. Bailey worked until midnight, then he closed the vault and went away. The occurrence was so unusual that the watchman pondered over it all the rest of the night. What did Bailey do when he went back to the Knickerbocker apartments that night? He packed a suit-case ready for instant departure. But he held off too long; he waited for something. My personal opinion is that he waited to see Miss Gertrude before flying from the country. Then, when he had shot down Arnold Armstrong that night, he had to choose between two evils. He did the thing that would immediately turn public opinion in his favor, and surrendered himself, as an innocent man. The strongest thing against him is his preparation for flight, and his deciding to come back after the murder of Arnold Armstrong. He was shrewd enough to disarm suspicion as to the graver charge."

The evening dragged along slowly. Mrs. Watson came to my bedroom before I went to bed and asked if I had any arnica. She showed me a badly swollen hand, with reddish streaks running toward the elbow; she said it was the hand she had hurt the night of the murder a week before, and that she had not slept well since. It looked to me as if it might be serious, and I told her to let Dr. Stewart see it.

The next morning Mrs. Watson went up to town on the 11 train and was admitted to the Charity hospital. She was suffering from blood-poisoning. I fully meant to go up and see her there, but other things drove her entirely from my mind. I telephoned to the hospital that day, however, and ordered a private room for her, and whatever comforts she might be allowed.

Mrs. Armstrong arrived Monday evening with her husband's body, and the services were set for the next day. The house on Chestnut street, in town, had been opened, and Tuesday morning Louise left us to go home. She sent for me before she went, and I saw she had been crying.

"How can I thank you, Miss Innes?" she said. "You have taken me on faith, and—you have not asked me any questions. Some time, perhaps, I can tell you; and when that time comes, you will all despise me—Halsey, too."

I tried to tell her how glad I was to have had her, but there was something else she wanted to say. She said it finally, when she had bade a constrained good-by to Halsey and the car was waiting at the door.

"Miss Innes," she said in a low tone, "if they—if there is any attempt made to—to have you give up the house, do it, if you possibly can. I am afraid—to have you stay."

That was all. Gertruce went into town with her and saw her safely home. She reported a decided coolness in the greeting between Louise and her mother, and that Dr. Walker was there, apparently in charge of the arrangements for the funeral. Halsey disappeared shortly after Louise left and came home about nine that night, muddy and tired. As for Thomas, he went around dejected and sad, and I saw the detective watching him closely at dinner. Even now I wonder—what did Thomas know? What did he suspect?

At ten o'clock the household had settled down for the night. Liddy, who was taking Mrs. Watson's place, had finished examining the tea-towels and the corners of the shelves in the cooling room, and had gone to bed. Alex, the gardener, had gone heavily up the circular staircase to his room, and Mr. Jamieson was examining the locks of the windows. Halsey dropped into a chair in the living room and stared moodily ahead. Once he roused.

"What sort of a looking chap is that Walker, Gertrude?" he asked.

"Rather tall, very dark, smooth-shaven. Not bad looking," Gertrude said, putting down the book she had been pretending to read. Halsey kicked a taboret viciously.

"Lovely place this village must be in the winter," he said irrelevantly. "A girl would be buried alive here."

It was then some one rapped at the knocker on the heavy front door. Halsey got up leisurely and opened it, admitting Warner. He was out of breath from running, and he looked half abashed.

"I am sorry to disturb you," he said. "But I didn't know what else to do. It's about Thomas."

"What about Thomas?" I asked. Mr. Jamieson had come into the hall and we all stared at Warner.

"He's acting queer," Warner explained. "He's sitting down there on the edge of the porch, and he says he has seen a ghost. The old man looks bad, too; he can scarcely speak."

"He's as full of superstition as an egg is of meat," I said. "Halsey, bring some whisky and we will all go down."

No one moved to get the whisky, from which I judged there were three pocket flasks ready for emergency. Gertrude threw a shawl around my shoulders, and we all started down over the hill; I had made so many nocturnal excursions around the place that I knew my way perfectly. But Thomas was not on the veranda, nor was he inside the house. The men exchanged significant glances, and Warner got a lantern.

"He can't have gone far," he said. "He was trembling so that he couldn't stand when I left."

Jamieson and Halsey together made the round of the lodge, occasionally calling the old man by name. But there was no response. No Thomas came, bowing and showing his white teeth through the darkness. I began to be vaguely uneasy, for the first time. Gertrude, who was never nervous in the dark, went alone down the drive to the gate, and stood there, looking along the yellowish line of the road, while I waited on the tiny veranda.

Warner was puzzled. He came around to the edge of the veranda and stood looking at it as if it ought to know and explain.

"He might have stumbled into the house," he said, "but he could not have climbed the stairs. Anyhow, he's not inside or outside, that I can see." The other members of the party had come back now, and no one had found any trace of the old man. His pipe, still warm, rested on the edge of the rail, and inside on the table his old gray hat showed that its owner had not gone far.

He was not far, after all. From the table my eyes traveled around the room, and stopped at the door of a closet. I hardly know what impulse moved me, but I went in and turned the knob. It burst open with the impetus of a weight behind it, and something fell partly forward in a heap on the floor. It was Thomas—Thomas without a mark of injury on him, and dead.

CHAPTER XX.

Dr. Walker's Warning.

Warner was on his knees in a moment, fumbling at the old man's collar to loosen it, but Halsey caught his hand.

"Let him alone," he said. "You can't help him; he is dead."

We stood there, each avoiding the other's eyes; we spoke low and reverently in the presence of death, and we tacitly avoided any mention of the suspicion that was in every mind. When Mr. Jamieson had finished his cursory examination, he got up and dusted the knees of his trousers.

"There is no sign of injury," he said, and I know I, for one, drew a long breath of relief. "From what Warner says and from his hiding in the closet, I should say he was scared to death. Fright and weak heart, together."

"But what could have done it?" Gertrude asked. "He was all right this evening at dinner. Warner, what did he say when you found him on the porch?"

Warner looked shaken; his honest, boyish face was colorless.

"Just what I told you, Miss Innes. He'd been reading the paper downstairs; I had put up the car, and, feeling sleepy, I came down to the lodge to go to bed. As I went upstairs Thomas put down the paper and taking his pipe went out on the porch. Then I heard an exclamation from him."

"Didn't he say anything you could understand?" I asked.

"He said something about the grave giving up its dead."

Mr. Jamieson was going through the old man's pockets, and Gertrude was composing his arms, folding them across his white shirt-bosom, always so spotless.

In the course of his investigations the detective had come to the inner pocket of the dead butler's black coat. Here he found some things that interested him. One was a small flat key, with a red cord tied to it, and the other was a bit of white paper, on which was written something in Thomas' cramped hand. Mr. Jamieson read it; then he gave it to me. It was an address in fresh ink:

LUCIEN WALLACE,
14 Elm Street, Richfield.

As the card went around, I think both the detective and I watched for any possible effect it might have, but, beyond perplexity, there seemed to be none.

"Richfield!" Gertrude exclaimed. "Why, Elm street is the main street; don't you remember, Halsey?"

"Lucien Wallace!" Halsey said. "That is the child Stewart spoke of at the inquest."

Warner, with his mechanic's instinct, had reached for the key. What he said was not a surprise.

"Yale lock," he said. "Probably a key to the east entry."

There was no reason why Thomas, an old and trusted servant, should not have had a key to that particular door, although the servants' entry was in the west wing. But I had not known of this key, and it opened up a new field of conjecture. Just now, however, there were many things to be attended to, and, leaving Warner with the body we all went back to the house. Mr. Jamieson walked with me, while Halsey and Gertrude followed.

"I suppose I shall have to notify the Armstrongs," I said. "They will know if Thomas had any people and how to reach them. Of course, I expect to defray the expenses of the funeral, but his relatives must be found. What do you think frightened him, Mr. Jamieson?"

"It is hard to say," he replied slowly, "but I think we may be certain it was fright, and that he was hiding from something. I am sorry in more than one way; I have always believed that Thomas knew something, or suspected something, that he would not tell. Do you know how much money there was in that worn-out wallet of his? Nearly $100! Almost two months' wages—and yet those darkies seldom have a penny. Well—what Thomas knew will be buried with him."

With the death of Thomas, I felt that a climax had come in affairs at Sunnyside. The night that followed was quiet enough. Halsey watched at the foot of the staircase, and a complicated system of bolts on the other doors seemed to be effectual.

Once in the night I wakened and thought I heard the tapping again. But all was quiet, and I had reached the stage where I refused to be disturbed for minor occurrences.

The Armstrongs were notified of Thomas' death, and I had my first interview with Dr. Walker as a result. He came up early the next morning, just as we finished breakfast, in a professional looking car with a black hood.

"I must make a double excuse for this early visit, Miss Innes," he said as he sat down. The chair was lower than he expected, and his dignity required collecting before he went on. "My professional duties are urgent and long neglected, and"—a fall to the every-day manner—"something must be done about that body."

"Yes," I said, sitting on the edge of my chair. "I merely wished the address of Thomas' people. You might have telephoned, if you were busy."

He smiled.

"I wished to see you about something else," he said. "As for Thomas, it is Mrs. Armstrong's wish that you allow her to attend to the expense. About his relatives, I have already notified his brother, in the village. It was heart disease, I think. Thomas always had a bad heart."

"Heart disease and fright," I said, still on the edge of my chair. But the doctor had no intention of leaving.

"I understand you have a ghost up here, and that you have the house filled with detectives to exorcise it," he said.

For some reason I felt I was being "pumped," as Halsey says. "You have been misinformed," I replied.

"What, no ghost, no detectives!" he said, still with his smile. "What a disappointment to the village!"

I resented his attempt at playfulness. It had been anything but a joke to us.

"Dr. Walker," I said tartly, "I fail to see any humor in the situation. Since I came here, one man has been shot, and another one has died from shock. There have been intruders in the house, and strange noises. If that is funny, there is something wrong with my sense of humor."

"You miss the point," he said, still good naturedly. "The thing that is funny to me is that you insist on remaining here, under the circumstances. I should think nothing would keep you."

"You are mistaken. Everything that occurs only confirms my resolution to stay until the mystery is cleared."

"I have a message for you, Miss Innes," he said, rising at last. "Mrs. Armstrong asked me to thank you for your kindness to Louise, whose whim, occurring at the time it did, put her to great inconvenience. Also—and this is a delicate matter—she asked me to appeal to your natural sympathy for her, at this time, and to ask you if you will not reconsider your decision about the house. Sunnyside is her home; she loves it dearly, and just now she wishes to retire here for quiet and peace."

"She must have had a change of heart," I said, ungraciously enough. "Louise told me her mother despised the place. Besides, this is no place for quiet and peace just now. Anyhow, doctor, while I don't care to force an issue, I shall certainly remain here, for a time at least."

"For how long?" he asked.

"My lease is for six months. I shall stay until some explanation is found for certain things. My own family is implicated now, and I shall do everything to clear the mystery of Arnold Armtsrong's murder."

The doctor stood looking down, slapping his gloves thoughtfully against the palm of a well-looked-after hand.

"You say there have been intruders in the house?" he asked. "You are sure of that, Miss Innes?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

One Thing at a Time.

"Why do you always eat a square meal before dining out?"

"So that I can give my entire attention to the management of the various knives and forks."

TENDENCY TO LIQUOR HABIT

Efforts at Promoting Temperance Necessarily Slow Owing to Customs of Ancestors.

We must not be surprised at the great difficulty in promoting temperance, not to speak of total abstinence, when we recall what a strong hold the habit of using intoxicants had upon our English and American ancestors. It has not been very long ago since liquors were kept on the sideboard in almost every home where the family could afford it, and were freely offered to every guest as part of the hospitality of the day, says Temperance.

It wasnot "good form" to refuse what was offered, and so the caller at several homes in the course of an evening was apt to find his head reeling and his feet unsteady as he left his hospitable friends and made his way to his own dwelling.

Not many considered it a very great disgrace to be under the influence of liquor, although hard drinkers were apt to speak with contempt of those who had a limited capacity and were speedily overcome.

Far back beyond those early days, in the old country our ancestors made free use of beer and spirits. These beverages were taken as matters of course.

The consumption of beer in an ordinary home was enormous. Besant in his "London" tells of a family where 21 quarts were taken daily, nearly 3 quarts for each person. "We must remember that there was no tea, that people would not drink water if they could get anything else, and that small beer was the national beverage, taken with every meal and between meals, and that the allowance was at each one's own discretion." As late as 1770 the men in a London printing office took a pint of beer before breakfast, a pint with breakfast, a pint between breakfast and dinner, a pint at dinner, another at 6, and a sixth pint when they stopped work. The potations were sometimes continued during the evening. Ale was also used in large quantities. Wine was used, but not so freely because of its greater cost.

Drinking in England in the 18th century was a general habit among all classes. The clergy, merchants, lawyers, judges, tradesmen and workingmen all drank. In 1736 there were 7,044 gin-shops in London and over 3,000 other places where gin was sold, so that one house in every five was a resort for drinkers, to say nothing of the vast quantities of beer, gin, wine and other intoxicants consumed at home.

Gin had grown to be the favorite tipple, especially with the work people, some of whom spent much of their wages in the fiery stuff that brought speedy intoxication.

When we think how extensively intoxicants were employed and how the old-time usages of the mother country were transferred to this land, and how general during the colonial period and for many years later here was the free use of liquors, we must not be discouraged at the slow progress of efforts at securing sobriety.

DISMISSAL OF THREE CADETS

Official Action of Naval Academy Officers Will Meet With General Approval.

The dismissal of three cadets from the United States Naval Academy in their graduating year because of drunkenness, will meet with general approval everywhere, says the St. Louis Star. If there is a single place in the public service where total abstinence from liquor ought to be made compulsory it is in the naval service, where officers have responsibility for the lives of thousands of men and safety of ships whose value is not reckoned by the cost of their construction, but by the possible consequences of not having them in time of war. It is difficult to prevent drinking by enlisted men of either the army or navy, and not of so much importance, but it can be prevented in the case of officers, on pain of dismissal, and few officers would prefer liquor to their commissions. The navy has lost much in life and ships through drink, and in efficiency, and the army has lost in efficiency, and is still losing, through the same cause. Some day it might be of tremendous importance. Annapolis and West Point are good places to start the officers on the total abstinence road as well as to impress them with the truth that regulations are made to be obeyed, and that an officer who cannot himself obey is not fit to command others who must do so.

Glasgow a Soberer City.

The Glasgow chief constable in a report issued recently comments upon the remarkable increase of sobriety in the city. Apprehensions for drunkenness totalled 14,167, a decrease of considerably over 4,000. While lack of money has no doubt contributed to increased sobriety, the chief constable states that the growth of temperance has been a great factor. A great deal of money has been spent on amusements, which was just as available for spending in drink. Compared with two years ago the apprehensions for drunkenness showed a decrease of nearly 7,000.

WORTH MOUNTAINS OF GOLD

During Change of Life, says Mrs. Chas. Barclay

Graniteville, Vt. — "I was passing through the Change of Life and suffered from nervousness and other annoying symptoms, and I can truly say that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has proved worth mountains of gold to me, as it restored my health and strength. I never forget to tell my friends what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me during this trying period. Complete restoration to health means so much to me that for the sake of other suffering women I am willing to make my trouble public so you may publish this letter." — MRS. CHAS. BARCLAY, R. F. D., Graniteville, Vt.

No other medicine for woman's ills has received such wide-spread and unqualified endorsement. No other medicine we know of has such a record of cures of female ills as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

For more than 30 years it has been curing female complaints such as inflammation, ulceration, local weaknesses, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, indigestion and nervous prostration, and it is unequalled for carrying women safely through the period of change of life. It costs but little to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and, as Mrs. Barclay says, it is "worth mountains of gold" to suffering women.

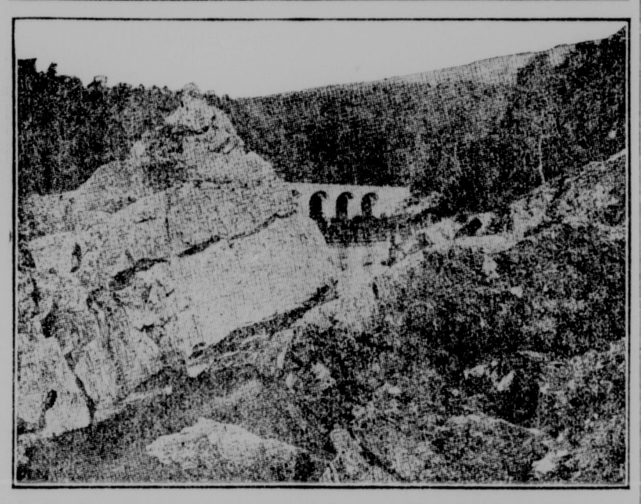
The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

Pass of Killiecrankie Sold



The Pass of Killiecrankie, one of the most famous and romantic spots in all Scotland, has just been sold under the hammer of the auctioneer as a part of the estates of Archibald Edward Butter, Esq. The historic road through the pass crossed the hill near Faskally House and descended to the ferryman's hut at the south end. Down this road many pageants of Scottish history passed. It was by this road that King Robert the Bruce, after the murder of Red Comyn, retreated from the battle of Methven where he had been surprised by the earl of Pemroke. By the same road Mary, Queen of Scots, went with her gay cavalcades for the famous deer-drives in the forest of Atholl. Through the pass went General Mackay with Hanoverian soldiers of fortune to meet and be routed by the clansmen under John Graham of Claverhouse—"Bonnie Dundee"—who had raised the standard of King James against William and Mary.

It was through the Pass of Killiecrankie that nearly 1,000 Atholl men marched to join the earl of Mar in the rising of 1715, and this way in '45 came the Young Pretender before he went south on his great adventure, which ended in disaster, and forfeited estates, and blood on many scaffolds.

The Pass of Killiecrankie is, indeed, a high-road of Scottish and English history. Edward III. came here with his knights in his attempt to trample the spirit of the Scots into subjection. Highland reivers drove their cattle along this road, and wounded men crawled down the pass after many a fight between the clans. The tramp of armed men, the fierce shouts of battle, the wild pibroch that called to the Highland chiefs, still come echoing down the glen to those who have listening ears.

MARRIAGE AFTER DEATH

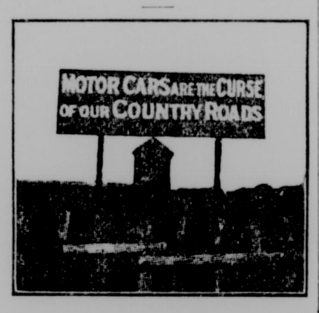
The marriage is reported of two dead lovers from the Japanese village of Shizuoka. A young couple fell in love, and sought their parents' sanction to their union. For some reason this was withheld in the case of the girl, and the broken-hearted couple resolved to commit shinju rather than be separated.

The two embarked on a fishing boat and when some distance from the shore bound themselves together with cloth brought with them for the purpose, and threw themselves into the sea. The following morning the couple were missed from their homes, and the matter was communicated to the police. Later on the bodies of the young couple were washed ashore, and, after the official examination, delivered to the parents. On learning of the tragedy, the mayor of the village was much affected, and calling upon the bereaved parents, proposed that the wedding ceremony be performed over the dead bodies, so that the deceased might be united in the other world. The parents agreed, and the ceremony was carried out in due form, even to the exchange of presents between the two families.

RALEIGH'S BIG GRAPE VINE

Visitors to Roanoke Island never fail to see the scuppernong grape vine, the largest in the world, that is known as Sir Walter Raleigh's grape vine. It was planted by Raleigh's party, which settled in Roanoke Island, N. C., more than 300 years ago. The adventurers left England on April 27, 1584, with the following charter from Queen Elizabeth: "Power is hereby given to Raleigh and his assigns by the queen freely to search for and occupy and enjoy for ever such remote and barbarous lands not possessed by any Christian people as to him might seem good. He is at liberty to take with him to such lands and leave there for inhabitants as many of the bushes," and so forth. The immense scuppernong grape vine, with stem larger round than a man's body, is an interesting relic of the past, and bears fruit abundantly.

DOESN'T LIKE AUTOMOBILES



In America the inhabitants of the rural districts not only have become reconciled to the automobile, but themselves own the cars by thousands and find them sources of delight as well as great conveniences. In England the rustic has not been so easily won over, as is witnessed by the sign here pictured. It stands by one of the main highways of the south of England and the man who put it up has kept it in repair for years.

"DEAD" MAN RETURNS HOME

A man named John Stevens, who was declared dead by a coroner's jury and whose widow afterwards married again, has reappeared in Preston, Eng., after an absence of nine years. A body found in the river was identified as Stevens' by certain marks on the arm. Certificates of death were issued, and Mrs. Stevens drew the insurance money. Stevens explains his long absence by stating that he has been tramping the country in search of work. She has lived happily with her second "husband," who is named George Harness, and there seems no way out of the tangle caused by the reappearance of the "dead" man.

NOTABLE ENGINEERING FEAT

Recently a notable piece of engineering work was achieved in San Francisco, while the demolition of the old city hall was in progress. Between the violent earthquake and the fearful fire of April, 1906, the building was practically reduced to a mass of ruins. So it was determined to raze the shattered structure and construct a new and modern hall.

Surmounting the lofty dome a huge statue of the Goddess of Liberty has perched for more than twenty years past. The statue escaped unscathed both the heavy shock and fire. This immense metal statue is nearly twenty feet in height, and, with the pedestal, to which it is firmly attached, weighs about three tons. From the ground up to the pedestal the distance is about 350 feet, and to the apex of the Goddess, is 370 feet.

As it was very much desired to take down the huge statue undamaged and to place it in Golden Gate park, as a public souvenir of the great disaster, the contracting firm undertook to bring it to earth without damage. This proved a difficult and perilous feat in engineering, for to bring down, undamaged, 6,000 pounds of metal from a height of 370 feet was a ponderous task. However, the work was done very successfully. By means of a system of derricks, steel cables, tackle, etc., operated by several donkey engines, the big statue was loosened from its firm anchorage on the dome's crest, and gradually lowered to the earth. The work was done without the slightest accident to the statue, or to the force of men engaged in the task. Engineers declare that it is a notable feat along engineering lines, at least of that kind, and the contractors are being warmly congratulated over the success achieved.

Paying His Rent With a Flag

The duke of Wellington holds the manor of Strathfieldsaye on condition that each year, on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo (June 19), he presents to the sovereign a French flag, a sign that the estate is held by favor of the king, and a reminder that it was given to the first duke as a reward for his services. Generally, the reigning duke presents the banner in person; indeed, he used to bear it to the sovereign himself, riding on horseback. This year, the court being in mourning, a representative of his grace took the "rent" to Windsor, and saw it set in place. The duke of Marlborough retains the Blenheim estates by payment of a similar fee on the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim (August 13). In each case, when the new flag is set in position, the old flag goes back to the duke. Non-presentation of the flag would entail forfeiture of the estate.

THEN THEY FIRED HIM.

IN AGONY WITH ECZEMA

"No tongue can tell how I suffered for five years with itching and bleeding eczema, until I was cured by the Cuticura Remedies, and I am so grateful I want the world to know, for what helped me will help others. My body and face were covered with sores. One day it would seem to be better, and then break out again with the most terrible pain and itching. I have been sick several times, but never in my life did I experience such awful suffering as with this eczema. I had made up my mind that death was near at hand, and I longed for that time when I would be at rest. I had tried many different doctors and medicines without success, and my mother brought me the Cuticura Remedies, insisting that I try them. I began to feel better after the first bath with Cuticura Soap, and one application of Cuticura Ointment.

"I continued with the Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment, and have taken four bottles of Cuticura Resolvent, and consider myself well. This was nine years ago and I have had no return of the trouble since. Any person having any doubt about this wonderful cure by the Cuticura Remedies can write to my address. Mrs. Altie Etson, 93 Inn Road, Battle Creek, Mich., Oct. 16, 1909."

All the Difference.

The professor was delivering an eloquent address on cruelty to animals, and, to illustrate how a little judicious forethought would eliminate to a great extent the sufferings that even small insects are subject to, said:

"As I was coming through the hall tonight I saw a bald-headed gentleman very harshly treat a little innocent house-fly which had alighted on his head.

"Now, if there was any justification for such bad temper, I would be quite justified in indulging in it at the present moment, for a fly has just alighted on the back of my head. I can't see it, but I can feel it.

The Stylish Fisherman.

One of the guests of a fashionable summer resort in West Virginia got himself up in his best fishing togs and started along a certain mountain stream.

Meeting a native, he asked: "Here, my good man! Kindly tell me whether it would be worth my while to try fishing in this vicinity."

The native regarded him scornfully. "The fishin' ain't good," he finally said. "but I ain't informed as to how you values your time."—Lippincott's.

Lemons Cure Malaria.

Lemons are said to be an infallible cure for malaria. This is the method of preparation: Take one lemon, wash thoroughly with a brush and hot water till all germs are gone, cut in very small pieces, using skin, seeds and all; cook in three glasses of water till reduced to one, and take this while fasting. A cure is generally effected within a week.

Mrs. Henderson's Waist.

Mrs. Henderson isn't going to wear that pretty white waist of hers again, because it came from the wash all streaked and spotted by the rosin that was in the common yellow soap.

If Mrs. Henderson will have it washed again with Easy Task soap, which has no rosin in it to streak and rot the fabrics, ten to one it will look like new. Easy Task does wonders for the clothes and for the women who work. Costs no more than poor soaps.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

WESTERN CANADA'S 1910 CROPS

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Wheat Yield in Many Districts Will Be From 25 to 35 Bushels Per Acre

Land sales and homestead entries increasing. No cessation in numbers going from United States. Wonderful opportunities remain for those who intend making Canada their home. New districts being opened up for settlement. Many farmers will net, this year, $10 to $15 per acre from their wheat crop. All the advantages of old settled countries are there. Good schools, churches, splendid markets, excellent railway facilities. See the grain exhibit at the different State and some of the County fairs.

Letters similar to the following are received every day, testifying to satisfactory conditions; other districts are as favorably spoken of:

THEY SENT FOR THEIR SON.
Maidstone, Sask., Canada, Aug. 5th, 1910.
"My parents came here from Cedar Falls, Iowa, four years ago, and were so well pleased with this country they sent to Coeur d'Alene for me. I have taken up a homestead near them, and am perfectly satisfied to stop here." Leonard Douglas.

WANTS SETTLER'S RATE FOR HIS STOCK.
Stettler, Alberta, July 31st, 1910.
"Well I got up here from Forest City, Iowa, last Spring in good shape with the stock and everything. Now, I have got two boys back in Iowa yet, and I am going back there now soon to get them and another car up here this fall. What I would like to know is, if there is any chance to get a cheap rate back again, and when we return to Canada I will call at your office for our certificates."
Yours truly, H. A. Wir.

WILL MAKE HIS HOME IN CANADA.
Brainerd, Minn., Aug. 1st, 1910.
"I am going to Canada a week from today and intend to make my home there. My husband has been there six weeks and is well pleased with the country; so he wants me to come as soon as possible. He filed on a claim near Landis, Sask., and by his description of it it must be a pretty place. My brother-in-law, Mr. Frank J. Zimmer, lives there and it was through him that we decided to locate in Canada."
Yours truly,
Mrs. Richard Henry Ebinger.

TAKES HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW'S WORD FOR IT.
Taylors Falls, Minn., Aug. 7, 1910.
"I shall go to Camrose this Fall with my cattle and household goods. I got a poor crop here this year and my brother-in-law, Axel Nordstrom in Camrose, wants me to come there. He formerly lived in Wilton, North Dakota. I am going to buy or take homestead when I get there, but I do not want to travel two times there, for I take my brother-in-law's word about the country, and want to get your low rate."
Yours truly
Peter A. Nelson.

WANTS TO RETURN TO CANADA.
Vesta, Minn., July 24th, 1910
"I went to Canada nine years ago and took up a quarter section of railroad land and a homestead, but my boys have never taken up any land yet. I still hold the railroad land. I had to come back to the states on account of my health. Please let me know at once if I can get the cheap rates to Ponoka, Alberta."
Yours truly,
Geo. Paskewitz,
Vesta, Minn.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1910.

For Congress, Sixth Congressional District.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR.,
Of Montgomery County.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

We are reliably informed by students that the Oakland High School opened Monday morning with an attendance most gratifying but under conditions that demand the greatest condemnation of the school authorities by an outraged public.

With an enrollment of sixty-five to seventy the board of school commissioners has divided up the school and distributed it around among four of the rooms on the ground floor of the old court house. Only one of these rooms is as large as the ordinary country school room. The senior class of the school is quartered for the year in the old vault of the clerk's office. While occupied as a vault Mr. Tower, the clerk, was obliged to operate a stove init, winter and summer, in order to preserve the records from dampness and keep them from becoming mildewed. This condition, as to dampness, still obtains in this vault and we may expect serious cases of rheumatism or other diseases among the students quartered there to follow. Why not send the class to the county jail, where the grand jury causes things to be kept sanitary, and have done with it?

The old court room, probably the finest school room in the county as regards size, light, ventilation, etc., has been given over to the manual training department on the plea that it cannot be heated. If this room cannot be heated as a class room or general assembly room for the entire school, the question naturally follows: can it be heated for manual training work?

True, the board has spent a large sum of money for painting the walls, woodwork, etc., of the building and installing natural gas for heating purposes, but persists in putting up the plea that certain portions of the building cannot be heated. This proposition will strike the average mind as being somewhat peculiar.

Two of the rooms are fitted with desks that were used by the primary grades of the public school last year. This furniture was made for infants and not for young ladies and gentlemen. A beautiful spectacle, indeed, to see grown boys and girls occupying desks with their knees up under their chins, their spines curved, in unnatural and uncomfortable positions, and expect them to keep up with the course of study prescribed by the school laws—as interpreted, however, by the great mind of the local board of school commissioners.

The filth, both in and out of the building, up to opening of the school and a day or two following, had not been cleaned up and had been the accumulation of years of idleness. The outbuildings are simply out of commission and the whole premises in a deplorable condition.

We understand the County Superintendent, in his address to the school at its opening, denied all responsibility for the situation and on the other hand Principal Palmer is quoted as saying that he did not feel responsible as he notified the board in ample time, in writing, that he was at their service if there was anything he could do to assist in getting ready for the opening, but received no reply, which is another indication of the courtesy generally meted out to those haying business relations with the members of the Garrett County School Board.

The school will waste a week or more in getting organized and during the time Superintendent Browning is intimidating the pupils with dire threats of an examination if he can get the State Superintendent to order one, in the hope, evidently, of cutting down the enrollment by demoting sufficient pupils to cause the school to drop to the second class. Superintendent Browning certainly must have the interests of Garrett county at heart if, by his efforts, he can cripple the High Schoo and divert $900 of the State appropriation and grind that much more from the tax payers.

It costs perhaps $20 per day to operate the High School. The pupils must lose a week or more of their school year at an expense to the county of at least $100, not taking into consideration the incalculable loss sustained by the pupils, all because somebody failed to put the school premises in a sanitary condition at the proper time.

Who is to blame?

And what does the great County Superintendent of the public schools of Garrett county mean by forbidding the teaching of physiology, spelling, United States history, geography, and mental arithmetic in the High School and taking the books on these subjects away from the pupils? While it is true on these subjects were studied in the lower grades have they been so thoroughly mastered that there is no more that can be learned in them in the High School? Or, is it Mr. Browning's object to make the pupils feel that the school is no good and drive them home in disgust and close it up? There are teachers in charge of the school, entirely competent, who ask no odds of Mr. Browning or any of his associates as to qualifications or ability to teach and to manage the school to the satisfaction of the pupils and the public if given a reasonable opportunity.

Moreover, we believe in the matter of an examination, that in an out-and-out, fair and square test there are pupils in the Oakland schools who could show the County Superintendent a few things that he never knew before.

Why doesn't this man Browning get out into the country and visit the schools as required by law instead of hanging around Oakland and handicapping, bullyragging and trying every mean little device in his power to cripple the High School? Or better still, now that he has lost the confidence and respect of the public not only in Oakland but in all sections of the county, and his efficiency as a Superintendent entirely at an end, why doesn't he pass in his resignation like a man and give us relief from this long period of gag rule under which we are groaning?

Must the public submit forever to the dictation of a set of men whose ambition seems to wreck the only accredited High School of the county by providing neither suitable quarters, nor adequate furniture, nor books, nor water, nor outbuildings only such as are a disgrace even to the name?

It is time for the people to rouse themselves and demand their rights and the rights of their children.

"Thou art beside thyself, Edward:
Much learning hath made thee mad."

THE MAINE ELECTION.

According to the returns, Maine has been carried by the Democrats. That is, Maine has been locally lost. There is nothing in the election of the Democratic nominee to use as a sign of the way the November elections the country over will go. The old fetich of Vermont and Maine being weather vanes means nothing at all; it has been so many times exploded. As The American had occasion to remark in connection with the victory of the Republicans last week in the former state, it did not signify anything as to the outcome of the elections throughout the country.

Very much less does the Maine election result denote. It simply records the fact that upon entirely local issues the Republicans lost. The principal issue of the campaign related to prohibition, and the aspect of this question was peculiar to the state. The outcome of the election, therefore, does not in the slightest degree reflect national sentiment; it means nothing for the hopes of the Democrats relative to the trend of the country.

No one pretends to say that the one or the other element of the Republican party will be dominant in the next Congress, but the Democratic successes in Maine do not indicate that the Democratic party will be strengthened materially. Mr. Flaisted, the Democratic candidate, is a man of warm personality, and has multitudes of friends. His election over his Republican opponent was looked for, and was conceded in advance by many Republicans. The Democrats of the state themselves do not regard the victory as symptomatic. They simply designate it a Maine victory. Neither the election of a Democratic governor nor a Democratic legislature, to make him effective, amount to anything in the general estimate for the country, any more than do the success of the Democrats in the congressional contest, as the gains made in this respect were a part of the general overturning of the state. Maine has lowered the Republican colors, but there never was a more intensely local election than that just held. Whether regular or progressive, the next Congress will be Republican, and the Maine election does not signify otherwise. As was said of Vermont, so with Maine, it may be remarked that the outcome is no index of the situation. These early states almost invariably are carried upon state issues, and the Republican or Democratic, the outcome invariably has but local signification.—Baltimore American.

GOVERNOR PATTERSON WITHDRAW FROM THE RACE.

Gov. Malcolm R. Patterson of Tennessee has surrendered the nomination for a third term given him by the "regular" faction of the Democracy. In a public statement he declares that he does this in the interest of harmony and Democratic success rather than see the Independent-Prohibition faction of the party throw its strength to the Republican candidate. While the prohibition sentiment in the State may be largely responsible for his retirement, there can be no doubt that his friendliness to the men who murdered former Senator E. W. Carmack, culminating in his pardon of the elder Cooper within a few minutes after the Supreme Court of the State had sustained Cooper's conviction, has been the determining factor. Patterson has received a popular rebuke which he could not withstand, and his enforced retirement to private life does much to redeem a shameful condition of affairs in Tennessee.

BLOOMINGTON.

Quite a large crowd from this place attended the closing night of the carnival at Piedmont Saturday. The B. & O. accommodation carried about a hundred passengers from the town and many walked down earlier in the evening. The electric fountain was the most talked of feature of the show.

Miss Bertha Tibbetts, of Blaine, is in town this week visiting relatives.

Rev. J. L. Duncan, in connection with his duties as pastor of the M. E. church here, has accepted the principalship of the Bloomington school. He comes to Garrett county with a life certificate from the State Board of Education and is endorsed by some of the most prominent educators in the state.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Grant, Jr., of Elk Garden, were guests of relatives during the latter part of the week.

Mr. Joshua Kight, of Cross, one of the oldest and most substantial farmers in the western end of Mineral county and the fortunate possessor of a large block of the valuable 14-foot coal which underlays his homestead, has just returned from Atlantic City where he went a few weeks ago for rest and recuperation from ill health. He was improved very much by his visit and is now actively engaged in the pursuits of the farm.

Mrs. Hanson Buckhannon, of this place, and daughter, Mrs. Matthew Watson, of Franklin, left Saturday morning for Buckhannon, W. Va., where they will visit relatives.

Mr. George Hopkins, a miner employed by the Marstellar Coal Company and residing at Hampshire, was caught under a fall of bone coal while digging coal last Saturday morning and sustained very painful injuries to his right leg.

Mr. "Ham" Wolf, who has, at different times, been a resident of this vicinity, is crating his furniture preparatory to moving his family to Charleston, W. Va., where he has secured employment.

An Austrian woman living with her husband and two little children in a small house near the B. & O. R. R., a short distance west of the Brydon coal dump, was assaulted by an unknown colored man last Saturday afternoon, who gained admission to the house by asking for something to eat. The woman's husband was at work in the mine and no one was near but the children. She is a large and powerfully built woman and although her assailant was, according to her statement, a very brutal looking man, she managed by screaming and fighting to frighten him away. He escaped to the woods just in time to avoid a party of miners who ran to the house when they heard the screams of the woman and her children. A search of the dense undergrowth around the house was made by the men but no trace of him could be found and it is supposed he escaped to the hills and later took to the railroad. The negro belonged to a gang of half a dozen or more negroes, who have been unusually active begging from door to door in this place in the last ten days.

During the severe thunder storm which visited the Cross neighborhood in Mineral county, W. Va., a barn on the farm of Mr. Burke Randall was set on fire by a bolt of lightning and entirely destroyed, together with some farming implements. The loss is estimated at about $100.

Mrs. Morehead, wife of Rob't Morehead, Sr., is lying very ill at her home at Empire.

Mr. N. U. Bond, of Oakland, drove to Keyser and return on last Saturday his Maxwell. He was accompanied by his two nieces from Brockwayville, Pa., who have been his guests for the past two weeks.

Mr. James Coffman, who has been track foreman for the B. & O. R. R. on this end of the 17-mile grade for the past twenty years, has resigned his po and left the employ of the company.

The construction of a law in reference to the Sunday ball playing by Attorney General Straus of this state, has given a new impetus to the sport along the line of the W. M. R. R. As long as no admission is charged, no salaries paid to players, umpires and officials, it is permissible. Many of the teams who have heretofore had their ball fields on the West Virginia side of the river where Sunday ball is prohibited, have cleared up new grounds on the Maryland side, where they can enjoy the game on Sunday without fear of being picked up by the sheriff or his deputy. The church people however, are raising cain and holding up their hands in holy horror over the interpretation of the law by the Attorney General and the consequent desecration of the holy day. They claim that the attendance on the church services especially the Sunday school has fallen off about 50 per cent.

Mr. William Wildman, of Kitzmiller, was a visitor to this place on Wednesday.

Mr. John Raley who has been out in the wilds of West Virginia hunting and fishing, returned home Wednesday.

Mrs. W. V. Gutherie, of Baltimore, wife of the publisher of the Baltimore Methodist, accompanied by her niece, Miss Adeline Bradburn, of Washington, D. C., is visiting Dr. and Mrs. Kemp of this place.

Dr. Wilding to Lecture.

Dr. George C. Wilding, member of the Newark Methodist Episcopal Conference, will lecture in the Methodist Episcopal church in Oakland on Wednesday evening, Sept. 28th, under the auspices of the Epworth League. Dr. Wilding's lecture will be "To the Top of Mount Hood." The lecturer is well known in this conference of his church, having at one time been a leading minister and for several years secretary of the annual gathering, later transferring to the Newark conference where he is very highly esteemed.

Water Power Electric Plant.

The machinery for the electric plant to be located at Friendsville, and which is to be operated by water power from the Youghiogheny river at that place, has arrived and will soon be placed and lights for that town will be operated as well as other smaller manufacturing plants to be located there. A small plant for the manufacture of a wire stretching device and wagon jack is now contemplated for that town.

Boy Crushed by Train.

Howard, aged twelve years, son of Fred Poffenbarger, of Chaffee, W. Va., near Kitzmiller, is dead from having been run over by a train while trying to cross the track. He stumbled. Both legs and his right arm were severed.

Married.

HENRY—BEVLNS—Mr. Julius Henry, son of Mr. Charles Henry, and Miss Rebecca Bevans, daughter of Dr. H. L. Bevans, were married Monday morning at 8 o'clock by Rev. Father Aloysius, of Cumberland, at Grantsville, in the Catholic church. The attendants were Miss Nellie Bevans and Mr. Urban O. Blocher. They immediately after the ceremony left in an automobile for Meyersdale and thence east for the honeymoon.

A Good Position

Can be had by ambitious young men and ladies in the field of "Wireless" or Railway telegraphy. Since the 8-hour law became effective, and since the Wireless companies are establishing stations throughout the county there is a great shortage of telegraphers. Positions pay beginners from $70 to $90 per month, with good chance of advancement. The National Telegraph Institute operates six official institutes in America, under supervision of R. R. and Wireless officials and places all graduates into positions. It will pay you to write them for full details at Cincinnati, O., or Philadelphia, Pa.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

Tuesday the semi-monthly session of the Orphans' Court for Garrett county convened with all members of the Court present when the following business was transacted:

Letters of administration granted F. G. Trout on the personal estate of Samuel B. Sandoe, late of Kitzmiller.

Letters testamentary issued to Mary M. Bealman on the estate of John E. Bealman, late of near Grantsville.

Messrs. W. R Offutt and J. C. Renninger were appointed guardians of Albert Lipscomb, a minor under the age of 21 years.

B. and O. Train Just Escapes Wreck

Baltimore and Ohio passenger train No. 2, from St. Louis to New York, came near having a serious wreck near Bloomington Sunday. As it was descending the 17-mile grade while crossing the stone viaduct bridge at Bloomington the pony truck wheels of the engine left the track, but the guard rails prevented them from leaving the roadbed. Had the engine left the bridge, which is on a curve and between 60 and 70 feet high and spans the Potomac river, it would have dragged the entire train to the river below.

ORDER NISI.

James A. Sincell vs. Mary Laraway and Albert B. Laraway, Mortgagors.

No. 1690 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

Mr. C. G. Harvey, who spent last winter in Blooming Grove, Texas, and the past summer in Chicago where he took a course in the Chicago University the better to fit him for teaching, arrived in Oakland a few days ago and after visiting his parents over in Ryans Glade country for a short time, left on Saturday night for Blooming Grove where he will resume his position as instructor in the academy of that city.

Mr. Andrew Gonder has rented the storeroom fronting on Alder street in the First National Bank building and is having it fitted up as a pool and lunch room. The walls are being nicely decorated by an artist who has been employed for several weeks painting scenery and wings for the Nally theatre, the latter work being extremely well executed. The designs are original with the artist and are very handsome.

Mr. Warner is the father of Mr. B. H. Warner, Republican candidate for Congress, and is an excellent gentleman. Both Mr. Warner and Capt. Hartsock returned to Oakland Friday evening and were guests of Mr. W. R. Stull.

Two thousand nine hundred and twenty-three persons were injured in the Fourth of July celebrations this year, of which 131 died. Sixty-seven of these deaths were due to tetanus (lockjaw) following the injury while sixty-four deaths were the direct result of the injuries. Of the latter 19 were killed outright by fire arms, 11 by explosions of powder, bombs or torpedoes, 6 by cannon and other causes, while 26 persons, mostly little girls, were burned to death by fire from fireworks. These are the results shown by the report of Fourth of July injuries published for the eighth consecutive year by The Journal of the American Medical Association. They show the appalling cost of the present methods of celebrating our great national holiday.

Frank A. Robbin's Big Circus.

Frank A. Robbin's Big Circus exhibited at Mifflinton on Tuesday, June 7, 1910. They arrived here on scheduled time and quite a large crowd flocked to the railroad to witness the unloading of the circus from their own special cars. Promptly at 11 o'clock they formed in line and paraded the principal streets all of which were pretty well filled with people from the country districts. The parade was fine and far more than expected by the people in this community. At 2 o'clock, p. m., when the performance began in the main show, the seats were all filled and many were compelled to stand, but that made no difference as the performance was of such an up-to-date character that all were more than satisfied. The fine actors, the trained horses and other animals and the whole circus throughout was counted to be the best that has pitched their tent in Juniata county for many years. It is estimated that the attendance was between 5000 and 6000 people.—Juniata Herald, Mifflinton.

Will exhibit in Oakland Friday, September 16th.

Buckwheat So Thick It Can't Be Shocked in Field.

Jasper Augustine's farming operations on his big farm at Addison were inspected Monday by several Uniontown men who made an auto trip over that way, one of whom tells his impressions as follows:

"Mr. Augustine was sitting on his front porch directing the threshing across the road. He was in his overalls and shirt sleeves and wore a big straw hat. With a handkerchief half as big as a sheet he was wiping the perspiration from his brow. He greeted us cordially and made us feel at home.

"Mr. Augustine has a buckwheat crop big enough to feed buckwheat cakes this winter to all the people of Fayette county and part of those in Greene. The buckwheat has just been cut and was so thick there was not room enough to shock it in the field. Part of it was shocked outside the fence and part on the fence."—Uniontown Standard.

IN THE MASTER'S STEPS

By REV. JOHN H. KERR
Pastor Arlington Presbyterian Church New York

Text: For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow his steps.—Peter II., 21.

When the apostle Paul wrote those words he referred specifically to the example of our Lord under suffering. Furthermore, it is worthy to note that his words were primarily addressed to those who were slaves.

It is not at all my purpose to use only this one side of the Master's example. I want rather to gather together from a wider range than this one text some of the leading characteristics of the example set us by our Lord. His is an ideal character of the ages, and we cannot too often bring before our minds its salient features.

The word "example" here is the translation of a word which is used only in this place in the New Testament. It means a "writing copy," such as might be found in a child's exercise book and designated as an aid in learning how to write correctly. The word "follow" is emphatic and implies close and dilligent following. If we catch the full meaning of the text, it is necessary to bear in mind these facts with reference to the two most important words in it.

"In the Master's steps." He has left us an example that we should follow his steps. The Master himself on several occasions cited his own acts as the only ones to be imitated by his followers. Thus he said concerning an act he had just performed: "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." Or, again: "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, even as I have loved you." So the apostle Paul cites our Lord's example, saying: "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." And in another place we read: "Let each one of us please his neighbor for that which is good, unto edifying. For Christ also pleased not himself." The apostle's aim in life was to reproduce as far as he could the life of his Lord. "For to me to live is Christ."

One of the reasons why "it behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren" was that he might show us the possibilities of which our natures are capable. Man needed to see how an ideal person acts. In addition to that which our Redeemer must do to make atonement for our sins, he must also set us an example in his own life, so that we might have a model after which we should attempt to conform our lives.

Of course there were many things about our Lord's life that we could not imitate, but there are other aspects of it which we must imitate. If we are to be able successfully to lay claim to his discipleship. We must walk in the Master's steps.

In obeying the Father's will. The psalmist has said: "Lo, I am come; in the roll of the book it is written of me; I delight to do thy will, O my God." The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews applies those words to Jesus, whilst he himself said: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me and to accomplish his will." Later in his ministry in the presence of a great multitude, Jesus affirmed: "I am come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." And in his last prayer with his disciples he said: "I glorified thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do." "Though he was a Son, yet learned his obedience by the things which he suffered.

Obedience is about the first thing the follower of Christ has to learn. Obedience is the Master's test. "Ye are my friends, if ye do the things which I command you." No amount of protestation that we are his followers will take the place of obedience.

We should follow in the Master's steps in resisting temptation. Our Lord hath been in all points tempted like we are, yet without sin." Nor were the temptations of our Lord matters of little moment. He "suffered being tempted." The conflict with Satan at the beginning of our Lord's ministry was a tremendous reality. Temptation once came to him in the words of Peter, so that Jesus said to him: "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art a stumbling block unto me." So again and again our Lord was tempted. It is to be wondered at that he should say so solemnly to his disciples, just as he was about to leave them: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." We follow in the Master's steps when we resist temptation. What an encouragement it is to be assured that "the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation."

In prayer is another way to follow in his steps. Our Lord repeatedly prayer. And this was not merely for its effect on his disciples. The Master prayed because he needed thus to hold communion with the Father. Remember the transfiguration scene on Mount Hermon, when, as he prayed his countenance was changed, and his whole person became radiant with glory. Our Lord said: "Watch and pray." If he needed to pray, much more do we.

If we follow in his steps, we will be regular attendants on divine worship. The record tells us that it was his custom to go to the synogogue on the Sabbath day. That simply means that he was himself an habitual attendant on divine worship.

New Modes in Wings

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

WHATEVER the season, whether because the aeroplanes have drawn our attention to the winged throngs of the sky, or because Rostand's "Chanticler" has really awakened the world to the beauty of feathers, wings, little and wings big, and all sorts of between sizes, grace the new hats for fall. They poise, folded or outspread, drooping or about to fly—in single pairs or whole flocks on the graceful shapes of the new season. Nearly all the wings are well made, and some of them are simply the natural bird wing, properly "cured" or treated for millinery use. Some of the very large ones are finished with breasts of the grebe or rosettes made of parted feathers or with feather cabochons, so that they are ready for placing on the shape. Velvet is used with wings, usually as a drape about the shape or forming a puffed crown. Some of the prettiest models show small shapes with drooping brims and high puffed crowns, with small wings set in an irregular row about the base of such crowns. Rosettes of silk or velvet centered with bird heads are a novelty, but women seem to prefer any part of the bird rather than the head these days, so not many of these are in evidence. There is something of an exception to this in the very unreal looking heads, or faces, rather, of the owl made up in feathers of brilliant colorings borrowed from the peacock and other birds of magnificent colors.

As may be seen in our illustrations, the poise of wings on the hat may vary from the folded wing of a sleeping child of the air to those spread for flight. The fancy of the trimmer is not curtailed in any way except by the lines of the shape she wishes to decorate and the becomingness of the result. Those are the only two things that count.

IN SPOTTED SWISS MUSLIN

Dainty Light Frock for the Warm Days, Worn With Hat of White Tagal Straw.

We show here a dainty dress simply made in spotted Swiss muslin. The upper part of skirt fits plainly and is cut in a slight point at the front, the lower part is gathered to it, the joining being covered by insertion; three tucks about 1½ inches deep trim this part of skirt. Groups of fine tucks are made across back and front, and strips of insertion are sewn between them; the sleeves are trimmed to match. A lace frill finishes the neck.

Hat of white Tagal straw, with a crown of puffed muslin, trimmed with ribbon at its base, and a large rose at the side.

Materials required: 8 yards muslin 27 inches wide, 6½ yards insertion.

Using Up Old Ribbons.

Have you a lot of bows, sashes and hat trimmings that are too faded and shabby for further use? Rip out all the stitches, clean off all spots, press all wrinkles and then put them into a dye pot with silk dye.

If you select ribbon of nearly the same color and quality to go in the pot at one time you should have enough good looking ribbon to make nice plaited frills for the winter petticoat.

These dyed ribbons can also be utilized as color linings, facings or in making a patchwork quilt. For such permanent work, however, it is better not to dye as it sometimes rots silk. Wash ribbon carefully and use the best bits.

To Make a Rose Pillow.

For a simple rose pillow dry the fresh petals on a dry day, but not in the sun, scatter a little orris root among them and a bottle of attar of roses and fill into pink glazed cambric covers. Make the outside cover of white linen embroidered with roses.

LITTLE TOUCHES THAT COUNT

Small Things Mark Dividing Line Between the Careful Dresser and She Who Is Not.

Stylish buttons for linen frocks are made by covering the button mold with the material and on top of them making a star-shaped design of three sections of coronation braid, two of the small figures of braid being used to a section. These are crossed in the middle of the button and taken to the outer edge to form the star.

Stylish rosettes of velvet or satin are made by doubling lengthwise bias strips of velvet three inches wide. Baste the lower edges together to prevent them slipping, then begin in centre with short roll and coil around until all the material is used up.

A trimming for a girl's hat of white lace is a deep floral band of forget-me-nots reaching almost to the top of the crown and with only the edge of the brim showing below it. This is divided through the middle with soft folds of interlaced blue ribbon ending in a big bow at one side.

Again the tiny stiff bows of black velvet or black velvet with a color are introduced across the front of the draperies and as a finish to one sleeve. They must be skilfully used not to look patchy.

Old-Timey Ruffles.

There is a fondness for all sorts of ruffled treatments, particularly those that are quaint and old-timey looking, and they are developed in every material that is on the summer list. A pretty little dress that looked of the vintage of the early eighties, was of fine Irish dimity, a flowered stripe, inclosed between stripes of black, all on a white ground. Yellow was the predominating color, though not very conspicuous among the flower colors that made up the pattern with it. The foundation of the skirt was plain gored, turned in a three-inch hem at the bottom. Meeting this hem was a deep flounce of fine embroidery that was applied at knee depth, with a ruching for a heading, the ruching of the dimity. Over this fell the tunic in pannier effect. Meeting at the center-front, the two side-lengths spread apart to disclose the whole of the flounce and the upper portion of the skirt. It was headed with an inch-wide ruffling of the dimity.

A Graceful Wrap.

A soft, light wrap for the woman who needs slight protection over the summer frock is made from soft crepe de chine in white or pale colors.

The double-width crepe is used, and the wrap cut on a circular pattern, something like a dolman back, that falls below the hips at the back. The fronts are cut into long points, reaching almost to the bottom of the gown.

The entire wrap is edged with silver fringe an inch and a half deep, the fronts turning back like a rever around the neck and to the lower points which end in a silver tassel.

Bathing Caps and Slippers.

It is said that the prettiest bathing caps seen on the beaches this season are those fashioned from gayly printed English chintz in a twisted turban design. When the slippers match, the effect is extremely good. Any girl who knows how to sew could cover ordinary bathing slippers, while the millinery part of the costume is a very simple matter. She can wear the turban or the mob cap style, as considered becoming. Both are fashinable.

The KITCHEN CABINET

"THE law of the table is beauty —a respect for the common soul of all the guests."—Emerson.

"How green you are and fresh."
—King John.

Ideas for Porch, Garden, Excursion and Picnic Parties.

This is the heyday of the picnic season, when we flee to the woods if we can; if not we satisfy ourselves with a day in the park, a supper on the beach, or a quiet porch party at home.

The really enjoyable affairs are those arranged without much preparation.

Wooden plates, aluminum forks, spoons and cups are not expensive and lighten the weight of the picnic basket. Paper napkins will be found to answer every purpose and are a great saving when laundry work bust be considered. As these outings are for special rest and health, care should be taken to provide only easily digested foods, especially where there are children. Older people may indulge in fancy dishes and highly seasoned salads, but the children should be spared. A cheap chafing dish is a convenience in which one may prepare a chipped beef, creamed; creamed eggs or rarebit. These, with bread and butter sandwiches, a simple salad and coffee, make a pleasant first course.

Fruit alone may follow as dessert. Sandwiches are in endless variety these days. Chopped meat or fish rubbed to a paste with cream, butter or mayonnaise dressing and spread on thin slices of either brown or white bread, make a nourishing, wholesome sandwich.

Sandfiches should be wrapped in waxed paper. Salad sandwiches are nice only when fresh, as standing only an hour will spoil their crispness and make them unpalatable. Fruits are always acceptable both as food and drink. They quench the thirst and satisfy the hunger without adding burden to the body. The salts and acids they contain cool and thin the blood.

Tomatoes are easily carried and served on lettuce make a pleasant addition to a meat sandwich.

Water is the best, most wholesome and cheapest drink. Lemonade is a great favorite, but should be used sparingly if serving other fruit in quantity. The lemon juice may be extracted and carried in a bottle.

Garden and porch parties differ from picnics in both arrangements and serving. The kitchen being within easy reach, dainty entrees, salads and ices are possible to serve. One large table may be arranged on the porch or under the trees or small tables may be scattered about.

If hot dishes are to be served the preparations may be made early in the day. Croquettes and cutlets may be fried, placed on a paper in the oven and reheated in a few minutes in a hot oven.

Cold dishes like pressed chicken, deviled tongue, or salads are to be chosen by those who wish to entertain on small means and with limited help. Where wise forethought and planning are done forty persons may be nicely served by a single maid.

UNLESS some sweetness at the bottom lie
Who cares for all the crinkling of the pie."

"I am glad that my Adonis hath a sweet tooth in his head."

Waldorf Salad.

Take a cupful of celery shredded, two cupfuls of apple cut in dice, a half cup nut meats. Mix all together and serve on lettuce with a mayonnaise or a boiled dressing.

When making apple pie put the apple without any sugar or seasoning into the crust and bake as usual. Slip a knife around the edge and remove the top crust; now add sugar, butter and nutmeg, seasoning to taste; put back the crust and serve. This method saves the loss of sugar and juice by boiling out in cooking.

Another nice way to serve fried apples is to core them, cut across, making circular slices, put in a pan with a very little fat; sprinkle with sugar and cook slowly.

A nice apple dumpling which is such a favorite with the children is made by preparing a biscuit dough; roll and cut in pieces large enough to cover a cored and peeled apple. Bake in a moderate oven and serve with sugar and cream.

Frozen Pudding.

Scald one cup of milk, add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, stir until dissolved. Mix a tablespoonful of cornstarch with a little cold milk, cook all together ten minutes, add a beaten yolk of an egg, stir until well cooked, then add a pinch of salt, a teaspoonful of vanilla, a cupful of steamer raisins and a half cupful of chopped nuts. When cold add a pint of cream and freeze.

Beach parties and basket picnics will be the chief attraction for the next two months. A few suggestions may prove helpful.

Husbands and Housecleaning.

The reason a man wants to get as far away from home as he can during housecleaning is that everything looks so desperate and it seems as if the work never would be done. If you would use Easy Task soap the work would be over in less time and would be done more thoroughly. Easy Task isn't like the yellow soaps that leave a lot of grease and rosin behind them; it makes everything sweet and clean; and it runs the roaches away. Confidentially, it is sure death to the "critters" that like to nest in the bedsteads.

Good Record Made by Women.

Through the activity of women, in the anti-tuberculosis campaign, sanatoria and hospitals for the treatment of tuberculosis have been erected; traveling libraries have been circulated, posters, circulars and other kinds of literature have been distributed to the number of millions of pieces, thousands of lectures have been given, large sums of money have been secured, hundreds of needy cases have been helped; tuberculosis work has been started in many communities where no movement had existed; and millions of women have learned the dangers and methods of prevention of tuberculosis. The work of the women extends from the drawing room of the rich to the homes of the poor, and embraces all classes, including the factory girl and millionaire. During the coming year a special campaign of lectures to women will be carried on in all parts of the United States.

LACK OF MONEY
Was a Godsend in This Case.

It is not always that a lack of money is a benefit.

A lady of Green Forest, Ark., owes her health to the fact that she could not pay in advance the fee demanded by a specialist to treat her for stomach trouble. In telling of her case she says:

"I had been treated by four different physicians during 10 years of stomach trouble. Lately I called on another who told me he could not cure me; that I had neuralgia of the stomach. Then I went to a specialist who told me I had catarrh of the stomach and said he could cure me in four months but would have to have his money down. I could not raise the necessary sum and in my extremity I was led to quit coffee and try Postum.

"So I stopped coffee and gave Postum a thorough trial and the results have been magical. I now sleep well at night, something I had not done for a long time; the pain in my stomach is gone and I am a different woman.

"I dreaded to quit coffee, because every time I had tried to stop it I suffered from severe headaches, so I continued to drink it although I had reason to believe it was injurious to me, and was the cause of my stomach trouble and extreme nervousness. But when I had Postum to shift to it was different.

"To my surprise I did not miss coffee when I began to drink Postum.

"Coffee had been steadily and surely killing me and I didn't fully realize what was doing it until I quit and changed to Postum."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Centennial Celebration of Mexico

By C. Piquette Mitchel

IT IS indeed fitting that under the able administration of that Grand Old Man of Mexico, Gen. Porfirio Diaz, Mexico should celebrate her centennial of independence and her early struggles for freedom and liberty. He, whose forceful military policy, whose familiarity with the pulse of his people, and whose consummate statesmanship have given his country a sound government and placed her on a financial and commercial footing with the old world, will preside as chief executive over the commemoration of the man and events which made it possible for Mexico to reach the present high state of civilization which she enjoys.

As the human sacrifices of the Aztec king, Montezuma, gave way to the bloodless offerings on the altar of the Fair God who foretold the coming of the Spanish conquerors, so the spirit of independence finally subdued the successors of Cortez and his hardy band.

The law which excluded Spaniards born in Mexico from equal rights with those who were immigrants and the consequent repugnance and jealousy which arose between the two parties, together with the alienation of the clergy and the removal of their influence in the enforcement of government decrees, which necessitated the use of more forcible measures, the granting of commercial monopolies, and the severity exercised in dealing with cases of treason, all worked to the establishment of a feeling of discontent and the growth of revolutionary sentiments.

But it was left to one of the clergy, a priest of the city of Dolores, Father Miguel Hidalgo, to give these sentiments outward expression and to raise the flag of rebellion against the mother country. Father Hidalgo was the second son of Christobal Hidalgo y Costilla and Ana Maria de Callaga, and was born on the Hacienda Corralejo in the state of Guanajuato on the eighth of May, 1753. His early years were spent on the farm of which his father was the manager. As he grew older he pursued his studies of philosophy and theology at the College of San Nicolas, and about 1778 he came to Mexico City to receive the sacred orders and the degree of bachelor of theology. He served as pastor of various parishes, and on the death of an older brother was transferred to the City of Dolores, where he worked for the enlightenment of his people in the arts and sciences and the encouragement of agricultural and industrial pursuits. He first introduced in that district the cultivation of the grape and the planting of mulberry trees for the breeding of the silkworm. He, moreover, established a crockery factory and a brickyard and constructed a tannery and other commercial institutions. All this, together with his generosity, made him much beloved by his parishioners and especially the Indians, whose language he was familiar with. Being fond of music, he taught them to play and formed an orchestra among them, giving all his energy to the greater civilization and progress of his country.

In 1809 there was formed in Valladolid a conspiracy which had for its object the assembling in Mexico City of a congress to govern New Spain in the name of Fernando VII., in the event that the mother country should fall to the arms of the French, which without serious intention might probably lead to the independence of the country. The uprising was planned to take place on December 21, but being discovered, all the conspirators were imprisoned. However, there being but little evidence against them, they were soon given their liberty.

The conspiracy being suppressed in Valladolid, sprang up in Queretaro with renewed strength. Here it received protection from the corregidor, or mayor, of that city, who furnished many recruits, pending the time when secret action would be no longer necessary. At this time Hidalgo became enlisted in the cause of the conspiracy; but it is not known by what motives he was influenced. He had had numerous discussions with his friend, Ignacio Allende, regarding independence, but with no more serious object on his part than pure argument and without thought of taking any active part in the movement. Allende, however, was quick to interest himself in the cause, although warned by Hidalgo that the originators of such enterprises seldom enjoyed the fruits of them. But in the month of September, 1810, Hidalgo received a letter from Allende at Queretaro asking him to come to that city on a matter of much importance. He went, but was little impressed by the people he met, as they were without resources and of small importance, and he returned to his home somewhat disgusted with his visit. However, another letter from Allende pictured the state of affairs in such encouraging words that he decided to give his time and energy to the cause. He had made in the town 25 lances and placed himself in communication with the drum major and two sergeants of the battalion of Guanajuato in order that they might secure some troop for the revolution. His efforts, considering the short time which he had, were most successful; but, unfortunately, the conspiracy reached the ears of the authorities and many were imprisoned. Hidalgo sent immediately for Allende, who arrived in Dolores on the night of September 14, and the whole of the next day was spent in conferences without any decision being reached as to the best course to pursue.

Meanwhile Joseft Ortiz, the wife of the corregidor of Queretaro, being an ardent believer in the revolutionary movement, sent a messenger to the town of San Miguel el Grande, so that Allende should be informed of the news. Not finding Allende, who had been summoned by Hidalgo, the message was delivered to another conspirator by the name of Aldama, who left immediately for Dolores, arriving there at two o'clock in the morning of the sixteenth. He found everybody asleep in the house of the priest, but awaking Allende, both sought the room of Hidalgo, who immediately arose and exclaimed: "Gentlemen, we are lost; there is now no other recourse but to attack the Spaniards." To which Aldama replied: "Sir, what are you going to do? For the love of God, what is to be done?" After this several hours were spent in vain discussion. Hidalgo now showed his greatness. He did not think of flight, although on account of his sacred profession he could easily have found safety. But he preferred to fight for his principles and his convictions. Knowing full well that his companions were in prison and the thread of the revolution had been snapped, without troops, without arms, he preferred to face almost certain death, remembering his warning to Allende, that seldom the originators of such undertakings enjoyed the fruits of their efforts.

Hidalgo then, with his brother, Allende, Aldama and eleven other men left his house fully armed and proceeded to the jail, and, threatening the mayor with his pistol, demanded the release of his fellow-conspirators. His demands having been complied with, he now had 80 men, whom he armed with the swords of the soldiers of the regiment of the queen, which were delivered to Sergeant Martinez.

It was Sunday and earlier than the usual hour for mass. Hidalgo, however, summoned the people of the town and the farmers from the surrounding country, from whom he secured by his eloquent words about 300 followers. A march was made to Rincon, which was taken without resistance, and many Spaniards were made prisoners. Then proceeding to San Miguel el Grande, he surprised the garrison and obtained arms and money. Meanwhile his march through the villages had augmented his ranks with people of all classes, principally Indians with machetes. He had found at one place an image of the Virgin of Guadalupe, which was attached to a lance and borne aloft as the future banner of the revolution, while the battle cry became "Long live the Virgin of Guadalupe and death to the Spaniards!" And yearly General Diaz gives this "grito" at eleven o'clock on the night of September 15, as he stands with his venerable head bared and rings the great bell of the National palace, to the enthusiastic applause of his people gathered in dense throngs in the public square, or zocalo.

On September 21 the insurgents marched through Chamacuero and entered Celaya, sacking the houses of the Spaniards and securing such money and arms as they could lay their hands on. Here Hidalgo was proclaimed general by a congress of the people, and Allende was placed second in command.

Hidalgo then set out for Guanajuato with about 50,000 men, and when he reached the city he found that the Spaniards had taken refuge in a large and strong building which had been used as a granary. Here the royalists had brought the government treasury and their private wealth, fortifying themselves as best they could. After a bloody conflict the place was finally stormed and taken and most of the inhabitants put to the sword. The houses of the city were pillaged and the destruction of property was general. Although Hidalgo issued an edict and attached grave penalties for the offenders, he was powerless to prevent the excesses committed by the undisciplined masses. After order had been finally restored Hidalgo turned his attention to the manufacture of cannon for his troops and the minting of the silver bars, from the many mines in that vicinity, which had been captured in the city.

Meanwhile the government prepared to combat the revolution and through the medium of the church sought to gain control over the minds of the lower classes, an edict of excommunication being issued by the the bishop of Michoacan against Hidalgo, Allende and Aldama. To counteract the effect of this on the minds of the people, Hidalgo published an answer, declaring his firm adherence to the doctrines of the Catholic faith and calling upon all to resist their oppressors.

On the eighth of October Hidalgo commenced his march to Valladolid, intending at first to attack Queretaro. Hearing of his coming, the authorities of Valladolid deserted the city and the army of insurgents was received by the citizens with great ovation.

On October 19 Hidalgo marched toward Mexico City and was met at Las Cruces by the royalist forces under command of Lieutenant Colonel Trujillo, who was surrounded by the insurgents and forced to cut his way through the enemy's rear and retreat to Mexico City. The battle cost Hidalgo about 2,000 in killed and wounded, and instead of advancing on the city he determined to retreat, being influenced in his decision by the news that General Calleja had left San Luis Potosi with reinforcements. The retreating insurgents and Calleja's forces met at Aculco; the former, however, with but little fighting, continued their retreat, leaving in the field their baggage and artillery. Hidalgo, with reduced forces, retired to Valladolid, while Allende posted himself at Guanajuato and was attacked and badly defeated by Calleja, with great loss in killed and wounded.

Hidalgo, meanwhile, repaired to Guadalajara with his reorganized army and was received with great pomp by the people of the city. Here he organized a form of government with Ignacio Lopez Rayon as secretary-general.

In January, 1811, Hidalgo moved from Guadalajara with the largest army that was ever under his command, meeting the much smaller force of the enemy under Calleja at the bridge of Calderon, about 35 miles from the city. The defeat of the royalists was turned into victory by a series of misfortunes, which, by the explosion of their ammunition wagons and the setting fire to the fields in their front, compelled the insurgents to retreat in great disorder. This was the beginning of the end of the brilliant career of Hidalgo. He fled with other insurgents northward and surrendered his command to Allende. At Saltillo it was decided to flee to the United States and to enlist the sympathy of this rising republic. But on the way they fell into an ambush planned in the interest of a counter revolution by a discontented revolutionary colonel by the name of Elizondo. Hidalgo and Allende were captured, tried and condemned to death, Allende being shot as a traitor on May 26, 1811, and Hidalgo on July 31. And thus perished a noble and brave man, Mexico's first and grandest champion of liberty.

To celebrate these stirring events of one hundred years ago, instead of erecting temporary exposition buildings at great cost, the money will be used in permanent improvements throughout the republic.

The program for September in the capital city will include the dedication of many new public buildings, monuments and parks, a great civic and military parade, a historical pageant, fireworks displays, balls, garden parties, free theatrical performances, and many other features. To assist in her centennial celebration, Mexico invited all of the nations of the world with whom diplomatic relations are maintained. The response was hearty and sincere, most of the nations sending special diplomatic representatives and not a few of them are represented by warships riding at anchor in the Mexican ports.

France, Germany, and China signified their intention of presenting Mexico a lasting memorial on the occasion of this centennial. The first will return the silver keys to Mexico given to the French on their entry into the capital, Germany will erect a monument to Humboldt, while China will give a suitable gift. Other nations will contribute in a substantial way toward commemorating the period.

MARRIAGE 2,300 YEARS OLD

Most of us make the acquaintance of Egypt in the splendidly dramatic story of Joseph and his brethren, and so come to look on Pharaoh and his people as gloomy and malign persecutors, fit only to be swallowed up in the Red sea waves, writes Charles Johnson in Harper's Weekly. Or we read of the graves and sober monuments of the Nile valley, with their perpetual reminders of death and the kingdom of night, with the result that we are hardly prepared to realize the gay and lightsome side of ancient Egyptian life or to credit the thought that those tomb builders could ever break into a smile. But there was a side of gayety and of charm, and just as we are finding that so many of our deeper and more philosophical thoughts go back to the people of the Delta, so we are beginning to discover the originals of all our jokes in the buried cities of the Nile.

That ladies were not unduly oppressed in the land of the Pharaohs we may gather from this marriage contract from a fourth century Demotic manuscript:

"I," says the lady Isis, "take thee as my husband. Thou makest me thy wife and givest me in token of dower five-tenths of silver. If I discharge thee as my husband, hating thee and loving another more than thee, I shall give and return to thee two and a half-tenths of silver, of which thou gavest me as my dower; and I cede unto thee of all and everything that I shall acquire with thee, one-third part, as long as thou art married unto me."

Not even Chicago or Reno can boast of a franker contract than that, and there is something wonderfully naive in the idea of the good lady Isis "discharging" her lord on the ground that she hates him and loves another better. The sum she returns him, as part of her now canceled dower, is about equal to a silver dollar.

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WELL?

The kidney secretions tell if disease is lurking in the system. Too frequent or scanty urination, discolored urine, lack of control at night indicate that the kidneys are disordered. Doan's Kidney Pills cure sick kidneys.

S. E. Vaughan, 601 E. South St., Iola, Kan., says: "Diabetes had set in and I expected to live but a short time. Kidney secretions were milky white and back pains were terrible. I was so dizzy my wife had to lead me. After trying everything else, I began with Doan's Kidney Pills and was soon helped. Continued use cured me."

OF COURSE.

The Friend—Your new patent medicine seems to have gained a great reputation for curing people. To what do you attribute its great curative powers?

The Boss—To extensive and judicious advertising.

Tough Luck.

"I thought you said this was a young chicken," remarked Newed, as he sawed away at a portion of the bird.

"And I thought it was," rejoined his better half. "I looked in its mouth and it showed no indication of having cut a single tooth yet. The dealer must have imposed upon me."

"Did he tell you it was a young chicken?" queried her husband.

"No," replied Mrs. Newed. "But I'm sure he must have extracted its teeth before offering it for sale."

Mr. Warner Is a Resident of Maryland

To the Editor of The Republican:

In today's issue of the Mountain Democrat I read a long argument intending to prove that Mr. B. H. Warner, Jr., Republican candidate for Congress, is not a resident of Maryland, and that he has, therefore, no right to represent the Sixth District in Congress.

The writer of the article referred to is evidently misinformed and will, I feel sure, be glad to correct this error when the facts are put before him. I have my office in Washington, but am licensed also to practice in Maryland, and I am much interested in Maryland affairs. I have known Mr. B. H. Warner, Jr., intimately for the past ten years and am in a position to know the the truth concerning the matter. Mr. Warner does not, as the article states, live with his father at 2100 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington. He is a citizen of Kensington, Md., and a resident of Maryland, and has been registered and voted and paid taxes there for years. His interests are Maryland's interests and he be is fully qualified to represent this District in Congress.

Mr. Warner during his campaign refrained from "mud slinging," his personal and professional standing is above reproach and I feel that, although this campaign story about his not being a resident of Maryland will be transparent to every intelligent voter, this is the time for his friends to come forward and put him in the proper light.

The Republican party has chosen him with their eyes open to run for Congress and they are going to elect him.

I am very truly,

J. A. GANNON, M. D.

Deer Park, Md., Sept. 8, 1910.

If the Governor Made a Mistake He Should Rectify It.

To the Editor of The Republican:

While the Governor is investigating the several official bodies of the State, the personnel of which he is responsible for by reason of the appointing power vested in him as Chief Executive of the State, why not turn his attention to the School Board of Garrett.

Generally speaking the actions of this board have been characterized by incompetency and inefficiency and with utter disregard of the wishes of the people. The schools of the county have been plunged into politics and the welfare and interests of the children have become political merchandise.

Locally speaking, every interest of the school of Oakland has been subverted to one end, and that is to make a good berth, at a good salary, for one who stands very close to the local politican and this against the earnest protest of seventy-five per cent. of the patrons of the school. Instead of standing up like men and honestly and fearlessly discharging the duties of their office to the best of their ability they have allowed their actions to be entirely dictated and controlled by one person whose sole purposes at present seems to be to avenge himself upon those who had the temerity to oppose him and whom the State Board of Education declared were right in their opposition.

By such acts and by reason of their inefficiency, the members of the local board and its secretary have become the objects of scorn and the most unpopular body of officials this county has ever dealt with.

Ninety per cent. of the citizenship of Garrett county is clamoring for the removal of these officials and if the power were vested with the people they would be displaced before another sun went down.

But why were such persons ever appointed to office? Neither of them have ever displayed any particular qualification that would peculiarly fit them for a place that involves the educational welfare of the children of this county. They are not particularly interested, from the standpoint of being patrons of any school, as the writer is not aware that any member of the board (unless it is Mr. Yost, whom four-fifths of the people of the county never heard of until he was appointed school commissioner, and we therefore cannot speak for him) have children of scholastic age. Then why were they appointed? Their acts since they have been in office fully answer this question, and we only hold the Governor of this State responsible for their presence in office so far as his failure goes to investigate before making the appointments.

We are aware that the selection of these men was the work of the local politicians of the county and the Governor made the appointments on their recommendations. But now he should investigate and if he finds he has made a mistake, which undoubtedly he will, let him rectify it by removing these men forthwith from office and appoint others who will in some degree at least regard the wishes of the people in matters that are of so much importance to them and means so much for the future welfare of their children.

A SCHOOL PATRON.

Oakland, Sept. 14th.

An Open Question Propounded the President of the School Board.

To the Editor of The Republican:

As a citizen and tax payer I have been much interested in what the papers of Oakland have said about the schools in your town, and I wish to ask the president of the School Board an open question, as follows:

What salary will be paid for manual training in Oakland this year?

We feel that the president of the board dare not make this fact known publicly to the tax payers.

As I am informed the salary of the manual training teacher has been $900 per year heretofore, and it was paid entirely from State fund. Now the State will pay but $400 for that purpose. Am I right?

Here at Deer Park we are perfectly willing that Oakland shall enjoy the great(?) benefit to be derived from manual training so long as the State pays for it, but if the school board continues to pay a pension out of our pockets as tax payers for someting for which our children get no benefit whatever, we feel that it is due time to call a halt and get a school board that has at least a grain of respect for the rights of the people.

I am unalterably opposed to the payment of one cent of county money to teach manual training to the children of Oakland.

BITTINGER.

The German Baptist Brethren held an all-week service at Bethel Chapel, near this village, concluding with services on last Sunday, at which time ten persons were baptized in the waters of Casselman river, near the meeting house.

Noah Stark, of Chaffee, W. Va., is spending this week with his parents at this place.

E. A. Browning, of Oakland, spent one night last week as the guest of C. E. Ellithorpe in this village.

Jonas Bittinger spent a day last week at Mt. Lake Park, during the period appointed for the Good Roads Conference.

Messrs. P. G. Stark and Melchor Hetrick, with their wives, were called to Mt. Lake Park last Wednesday by the sudden death of Samuel J. Slabach.

Messrs. Joel Orendorf and Gus. Stanton drove down to Keyser, W. Va., last Monday to purchase some peaches.

Benjamin Long, of Mt Lake Park, was the guest of Miss Effie Bittinger at her home in this village last Sunday.

Master Tommy Wiley, youngest son of Thomas B. Wiley, was kicked by a colt on last Monday evening and painfully injured about the face.

Our public school opened on last Monday morning with Prof. J. C. Beahm in charge and the enrollment reached fifty-four the first day, with a prospect of a considerable increase during the week and it is to be hoped that an assistant teacher will be appointed to aid Prof. Beahm. We may then hope for a most successful term of schooling for the pupils.

WEST VIRGINIA MURDERER ARRESTED HERE FRIDAY

Harry Clark Cut Harry McCann's Throat at Davis Night Before.

Friday morning a telegram addressed to the Chief of Police of Oakland, directing that official to arrest and hold Harry Clark, colored, wanted for murder committed at Davis the night before, had hardly been delivered before Sheriff Shartzer, who was made acquainted with the fact that the man was wanted, had him under arrest and lodged safely in jail.

The murder at Davis was the result of a barroom brawl in which Harry McCann, white, and Harry Clark, colored, were the participants and which resulted in the death of the former whose throat was cut from ear to ear by Clark, the weapon he used being a common pocketknife which was found upon his person by the sheriff after his arrest and commitment to jail.

Clark, after the murder, stole a horse from the stable of the Western Maryland Gas company at Davis which he rode to within a few miles of Oakland when he traded the animal to Henry Smouse for another horse and a check amounting to $30. Shortly after the trade was consummated Mr. Smouse learned of the murder at Davis and suspecting that the man to whom he had given the check was Clark telephoned into Oakland and stopped payment on the paper. This was the first intimation that the man wanted had arrived here and shortly afterward he was arrested at the Manhattan Hotel and committed to jail as above stated where he was held until Sunday morning when State's Attorney Charles D. Smith, of Parsons, accompanied by a deputy sheriff from that place and Henry Haller, of Davis, took the prisoner to Parsons where he was committed to jail to await his trial.

Clark is a son of Howard Clark, a resident ot Davis, but who up to a few years ago resided in this county opposite the town of Henry where he conducted a saloon until put out of business by the operations of a law passed several years ago by the Maryland Legislature, the constitutionality of which was attacked by Clark, but which was upheld by both the Circuit Court and the Court of Appeals.

Messrs. Speicher Bros. shipped from Oakland this morning to Shinnston, W. Va., one of their imported Belgian stallions which they will place on sale at that point. The animal is an exceedingly handsome horse, four years old, standing eighteen hands high and weighs nearly 2200 pounds.

COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY FORMALLY LAUNCHED

At a Meeting of Citizens Held at the Court House Saturday.

On last Saturday afternoon a public meeting was held in the Court House in the interest of the organization of "The Farmers' Fair Corporation," of Garrett county, a charter for which has been obtained.

For some time an organization of this kind has been talked of for our county, and the time now seems ripe for carrying out the project. Messrs. M. A. Jolliffe, S. R. Nuzum and Earl Smith, of Fairmont, W. Va., who are ready to give their experience and financial support, were present to encourage the movement.

The charter states that "the objects and purposes for which the corporation is formed, are the promotion of farming interests and all agricultural and horticultural pursuits, including the improvement of stock, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs and all other domestic animals and fowls, to induce farmers to use the most improved machinery, and to use the best seeds for planting and sowing, etc.; to provide a fair ground and equip it with all necessary buildings and fixtures, and to make it suitable for holding a County Agricultural fair or fairs in Garrett county, Maryland. The total amount of Capital Stock of said Corporation is Twenty-five Thousand Dollars, divided into Twenty-five Hundred Shares of the par value of Ten Dollars each."

The charter provides for a board of seven directors to be elected by the cumulative voting plan, which practically insures representation upon the board by any particular interest or section.

All of the speakers were enthusiastic in their endorsement of the movement and spoke confidently of the success that might be expected when our farmers take hold of the plan and give their subscription to the stock and promises of cooperation.

It is desired to have all farmers join the association and subscribe for one or more shares of stock, thus creating a general and widespread interest.

With this end in view a committee was named with Lieut. E. S. West as chairman to solicit stock subscriptions.

Let any one who will subscribe send their names to Lieut. E. S. West, Oakland, Md., with promises of aid and encouragement.

TWO MORE DEATHS BY ACCIDENTS ON RAILROAD

An American and an Italian Killed Former at Hutton, Latter at Deer Park.

By reason of the great number of men employed along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad in this section many serious and fatal accidents have occurred during the past two or three months.

Last Thursday night Harry M. Shaffer, aged twenty-nine years, a resident of Susquehanna, Pa., employed as an engineer by F. H. Clements & Co., at Hutton, who are engaged in doing heavy construction work on the B. & O., was struck and killed in Fifty-eight Cut by eastbound passenger train No. 12. The man was returning to his boarding place, having but a few minutes before left the company of some of his fellow workers. His body was terribly mangled and was unrecognizable, the only means of identification being some papers found upon the remains after they had been brought to Oakland and given in charge of Mr. D. E. Bolden, the undertaker, who prepared the body for burial and shipped it to his former home where he leaves a widow and two children.

Another fatal accident was that which occurred near Deer Park Monday evening when an Italian, Ereollo Bellofiore, aged about twenty years, was struck by a freight train as he was crossing the track in front of it, his death ensuing a short time afterward. The interment of his remains was made in the Catholic cemetery in Oakland after services were conducted in the church yesterday morning by Rev. James E. Connell which were attended by upwards of fifty Italian fellow workers of the deceased.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. JOSEPH MORELAND.

Mrs. Ellen Brown Moreland, wife of Judge Joseph Moreland, is dead, at Morgantown, W. Va., aged 50 years. She was a sister of the late Commander R. M. G. Brown, U. S. N., and also of Mrs. D. I. Totten, of Oakland.

MRS. GEORGE BRANT.

Mrs. George Brant, daughter of John T. Weimer, formerly of McHenry, who recently accompanied her father to the far west, in quest of health, died on Monday, Sept. 5, at Grand Junction, Col. She was aged about 25 years and had been suffering from tuberculosis. Her remains were interred at Grand Junction. She leaves a husband and one child, the former residing at McHenry.

JAMES CLARK MCGREW.

James Clark McGrew, who claimed the distinction of being the oldest ex-Congressman in the United States, died at his home in Kingwood Sunday in his ninety-eighth year.

Death came unexpectedly from heart failure following the celebration of his ninety-seventh birthday last Wednesday. He served in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses, and was one of the 55 Unionists in the famous Richmond convention who opposed secession from Virginia. He was a remarkable man in many particulars. After his eightieth birthday he learned to operate a typewriter and conducted his own correspondence.

Mr. McGrew was an example of the self-made man, a true example of the advancement from humble beginnings. He was endowed with natural ability, character and energy. His father's ancestry was Highland Scotch, his mother's Protestant Irish. His father, Col. James McGrew, had command of a regiment of Virginia militia in the War of 1812.

ANDREW W. DUTY.

Mr. Andrew W. Duty, who has been a resident of Oakland for the past two years, died at his home on Centre street yesterday afternoon after months of illness resulting from cancer of the stomach. The deceased was born May 12, 1833, and was therefore in his 78th year. He was a member of the U. B. church for more than 54 years. While a resident of Oakland, however, he was a regular attendant at all the services of the Lutheran church, in which denomination he had many warm friends. During the Civil War Mr. Duty was sergeant-major of the 14th W. Va. Vol. Infantry, being a member of Co. E of that regiment. He was a prisoner at Andersonville for more than six months where he underwent all the hardships of a prisoner of war. He leaves eight children, one of whom, Miss Mae, resided with him in Oakland where she has many friends. The other children, all of whom are grown, reside in West Virginia and Ohio. Mr. Duty's funeral will occurr at Centreville, W. Va., on Saturday, to which point the remains will be shipped tonight.

SCHOOL AFFAIRS INVESTIGATED BY DR. STEPHENS

The State Superintendent, Who Arrived Here Tuesday Morning.

Dr. M. Bates Stephens, State Superintendent of Education, dropped into Oakland unexpectedly and unannounced Tuesday morning and spent the day investigating school conditions as they exist in the two Oakland schools, but of course he gave no public expression as to his conclusions nor intimation what his report to the State Board would be. There is a general feeling prevailing, however, that Dr. Stephens thoroughly acquainted himself with every phase of the question which brought him to Garrett county and that his report and recommendations to the State Board will be satisfactory to the people at large.

While Dr. Stephens did not state in so many words that he had been directed to come here by Governor Crothers and quietly investigate school matters, the belief prevails that he was sent by the executive in response to a petition signed by about sixty school patrons addressed to the Governor and forwarded to him last Thursday night in which a demand was made for the removal of the present County Superintendent, coupled with the request that a member of the State Board be directed to come here and investigate conditions and thus acquaint himself with affairs as they exist.

It was evident last Friday that the school board had become acquainted with the movement, as school was adjourned at noon and during the rest of that day and all day Saturday superhuman efforts were made in changing the furniture in the two buildings, improving the sanitation and cleaning up generally, so that when Mr. Stephens did arrive conditions were very much improved and bettered.

The result of Mr. Stephens' visit to Oakland is awaited with much interest by the general public.

COMMITTEE MEETING

County Central Committee to Meet Monday Morning in Oakland.

Chairman Austin Brown, of the Republican County Committee requests that all members of the several district committees meet with the County Committee in Oakland Monday morning at 11 o'clock for a conference and also for the purpose of organizing for the coming campaign.

A full attendance is requested.

A full line of Gas Ranges, Heaters, Hot Plates, Inverted and Upright Lights. Call and see us. S.Lawtont & Sons.

The National Pike.

One thing is sure—that all legislation, national and State, affecting the National Pike, has contemplated its building and maintenance as a trans-continental highway as far as that ideal could be consummated.

Indeed, as early as 1797 the project was mooted as "The Gateway to the West," and five years later, when Ohio was admitted as a State, it was provided that 5 per cent. of the proceeds of public land sales should be appropriated to the construction of a through highway from east to west.

This furnished a precedent for similar provisions in the Acts admitting Indiana, Illinois and Missouri.

Construction began in 1811 and ten years later it was opened to travel, and for thirteen years it was a National highway, the States having no control whatever.

In 1834 the government turned it over to the States upon condition that it could be reclaimed if, for any reason, the government should require it.

The States through which the highway passes have, therefore, been "the trustees of an express trust"—a trust which, in Maryland, has been wofully neglected, if not abused.

This history is briefly recited by the Journal with the hope that it may help to impress those in highway authority with a sense of official obligation to restore the road to its ancient prestige as America's first model highway, bond of union between the east and the west.

More than this, perhaps, the material needs of both through travel and local traffic demand this at hundreds of places. No community suffers from the advertising it gains from location on a much-traveled route, and all communities are beneficiaries of easy access from their industrial environment.

If the National Pike were restored to passability, not Frostburg alone, but there isn't a town on its entire length, no matter how prosperous, whose prosperity would not be further promoted.

It was correctly stated at the Cumberland meeting that the primary design of the Road Commission Act was to build "through highways," one of which everybody understood to be rebuilding the long Maryland stretch of the National Pike.

Taking its cue from this conception, the Road Directory of Allegany county determined to "make good" locally by building a road from Westernport up the creek, crossing the pike at Frostburg, to Mt. Savage, and, connecting with the pike above Cumberland, achieve a model through route all the way through the most populous portions of the county from the western to the eastern limit.

With this as a platform at least one candidate for Director was elected last year, furnishing incontestable proof of what the people understood, felt and intended to promote.

But the State has "gone back" on them. The State has failed to co-operate, as promised. The National Pike has had to surrender its first paramount turn at the call of cross-road squeaks, whose building policy puts on the roof before the foundation is laid.

In consequence, the eastbound tourist debouches north or south before he reaches Garrett county, and the Garrett county farmer must go to markets already crowded.

The situation is one which calls for strenuous popular action, especially in this county.—Frostburg Journal.

FIRST TEST OF FIRE FIGHTING APPARATUS

Was Successful When a Blaze at the Naylor Building Was Extinguished.

Oakland's recently installed fire fighting apparatus had its first real test last Thursday afternoon about three o'clock when a passer-by noticed fire on the roof of the three-story building owned by Mr. A. D. Naylor and located on Liberty street.

With the first alarm a large crowd gathered in remarkably few moments and in less than two minutes thereafter the hose reel was on the ground, connections had been made with the fire hydrant at the Presbyterian church corner and a stream of water was playing upon the fire which was out in less time than it takes to relate it.

The pressure of water was surprising to many, the force being sufficient to send the stream clear over the roof and upon the roof of the Frantz Hotel which adjoins the building owned by Mr. Naylor.

Very little damage, aside from burning a place about ten feet square through the roof, resulted from the fire.

BRAINARD H. WARNER, JR., IN OAKLAND LAST NIGHT

Was Here to Arrange for an Aggressive Campaign to Begin Monday.

Mr. Brainard H. Warner, Jr., Republican nominee for Congress, was in Oakland yesterday afternoon and evening, returning east on train No 12 which left here at 8.30 o'clock.

Mr. Warner came here primarily to confer with the Republican committee and workers in the party, when the campaign, which will begin on Monday evening with a meeting to be held at Accident will be inaugurated.

Mr. Warner's visit to Garrett county was delayed owing to a slight attack of appendicitis which he suffered two weeks ago and from the effects of which he has not yet fully recovered. He is aggressive, however, and the campaign planned for the ensuing weeks throughout the district will carry him into almost every section of the five counties composing it. He expresses himself as satisfied with prevailing conditions in other counties and is very much encouraged by the outlook especially in Allegany county which Mr. Warner visited prior to coming to Oakland.

Preston County Seat Removal Fight.

A Kingwood paper has the following:

We have a good corps of shysters already to work this county for county seat removal, but we need 100 more of the meanest scamps at once.

The best men for dirty work are the men ready to do it. All applicants must furnish satisfactory evidence of necessary qualifications.

Big pay for the right parties. No one need expect a job unless he conforms to the following:

He must be a member of the leading church in the community where he resides. He must appear pious and be able to make a flowery prayer but he must be ready and willing at all times to take any advantage that would bring him a nickel. He must possess sham modesty to such a degree that he can blush at the slightest hint. He must be able to have a fit at any time he hears an oath where any of his church members are. On the other hand he must be vulgar enough to shame a brother and swear in such a way that a boat captain would die of envy.

To be plain, we want hypocrites who will not hesitate to commit any outrage so long as they are paid for it. Decent men need not apply.

Try the Rock Island Battery for your automobile and telephone. Will outlast any two ordinary ones. A. D. NAYLOR

Feathers in Style

THERE is a growing sentiment against wearing the plumage of birds, in varieties where cruelty must be practised to secure it. Women are learning to discriminate in this matter and to forego the wearing of plumage that promises to bring about the extinction of a species of beautiful wild birds or to inflict torture. A proud crest of dainty feathers torn from the back of a mother bird and the death of a nest full of fledglings by slow starvation, are not pleasant suggestions to flaunt with the group of sweeping aigrettes upon the head of beauty. For the wearer must be either uninformed, or indifferent, or unmindful of cruelty. None of the excuses will pass muster with intelligent people.

Aside from a very few sorts, the feathers we have worn recently and those we will wear, are made from the plumage of domestic or other edible birds. No cruelty is practised in securing them and thousands of people make a living by manufacturing the millinery trimmings made of them. Feather bands, sewed wings, pompons, breasts and mounted sprays—in fact, a world of airy and attractive decorations—are cleverly fashioned from the feathers of the turkey, chicken, pigeon, peacock and pheasant. These are bleached, dyed, eaten with acids, pieced and pasted until their origin is lost sight of. Other birds of bright plumage, such as the parrot, and birds like the blackbird and sparrow, of which there are myriads, are used, but they are not cruelly treated, unless sudden death is cruel.

The wearing of a bird upon the hat may be in questionable taste and at present one sees almost no birds, but any amount of plumage. Gradually the wearing of feathers may die out, but the signs of the times do not point that way. More plumage is shown now than ever before. Women should learn to discriminate in choosing it, and select those feathers which they may wear with an easy conscience. They are obliged to inform themselves in some states of the Union or run the risk of forfeiting their forbidden property. For laws have been passed and are enforced to protect certain birds, and one may not own their plumage.

PLEA FOR THE GROWING GIRL

Problem of Maternal Management That Is Worth Some Serious Consideration.

So many older women seem to think that because a girl of from fourteen to twenty or so is likely to be callow and sometimes forward and rather ridiculous in her pretentions of age and dignity she must be continually snubbed and "put down." They keep calling her "child" and laughing at her opinions and criticisms, and leaving her out of discussion and conversation, until some day they awake with a start to realize that the child is a woman, and a pert and embittered woman at that.

Of course, American girls are notorious for their unpleasant presumption, and there are many, many things which a girl in her teens is not competent to decide for herself, let alone for others; but there is no reason why a girl who really is growing up should be made to feel that she is always in the way and must be patronized when she is noticed at all. Give her at least a chance to feel that she is one of the family and that she is a step above the children in the nursery, whom she is likely so to despise.

Here, as elsewhere, "you will go most safely in the middle," and this rather delicate problem of maternal management will settle itself if consideration and common sense are learned on one side and taught on the other.—Exchange.

Short Skirts or Long?

There can be no doubt that the really short skirt has thoroughly established itself this spring. Of course, for walking and all outdoor games it is a delightful and most sensible fashion, but there is some question as to its beauty and suitability where the dressy afternoon frock or evening toilet is concerned. For the quite young woman who is still in her teens, or has recently quitted them, the short frock looks girlish and pretty, and is, moreover, very practical and comfortable. But with the older woman it is quite a different matter. She looks simply ridiculous in these fashionable curtailed skirts, and, far from giving her a girlish appearance, they add years to her apparent age.

Garters for Short Socks.

Garters for short socks for the kiddies are being made of hat rubber instead of the wider and more conspicuous garter rubber or the untidy nothing at all. Usually it is white, though for pink or blue socks it can easily be painted the color desired.

The KITCHEN CABINET

"DYSPEPSIA is the stronghold of depravity. An abused and impaired stomach is but another name for the eclipse of faith."

Some Summer Drinks.

Too much cold water is not good to drink during the hot weather. Lemonade and other cooling drinks, if taken in moderation, are both cooling and beneficial. The old-time ginger water, made by adding a tablespoonful of ginger to a quart of cold water, sweeten to taste with either brown or white sugar. In the old days they used molasses for sweetening and for those who want the old-time twang molasses is still popular.

Another wholesome drink is made of ginger and hops. Boil a handful of hops in a pint of water twenty minutes, then strain, pressing to remove all the water. Boil together three pounds of sugar, a quarter of a pound of ginger (sliced) and four quarts of water, twenty minutes, let stand until cool, then strain, add the hop water and use when cold.

Gingerade.—Boil together one-quarter of a pound of sliced green ginger and two quarts of water and three pounds of sugar twenty minutes. Add a lemon thinly sliced and let stand until lukewarm. Strain, add four quarts of warm water and one-third of a yeast cake, let stand until fermented, bottle and keep in a cool place.

Cokos.

Mix together a quarter of a pound each of breakfast cocoa and oatmeal and six ounces of sugar. Pour slowly over it one gallon of boiling water, stirring well. This is ready to use as soon as cold.

Zambumbia.

Spread one pound of coarsely ground barley on a pan and brown slightly in the oven, stirring constantly. Put into a crock, cover with six quarts of water, cover with a cloth and let stand three or four days until it begins to ferment. Sweeten with brown sugar or honey and serve cold.

Mead.

Take four ounces of tartaric acid, two ounces of the essence of sassafras, three pints of water, one pint of molasses and three pounds of sugar. Simmer to melt the sugar. Use half a teaspoonful of soda, teaspoonful of the sirup to half a tumbler of water.

LET there be many windows in your soul,
That all the glory of the universe
May beautify it. Not the narrow pane
Of one poor creed can catch the radiant rays
That shine from countless sources. Tear away
The blinds of superstition. Let the light
Pour through fair windows, broad as truth itself,
And high as heaven—Tune your ear
To all the wordless music of the stars,
And to the voice of nature; and your heart
Shall turn to truth and goodness as the plant
Turns to the sun. A thousand unseen hands
Reach down to help you to their peace-crowned heights;
And all the forces of the firmament
Shall fortify your strength. Be not afraid
To thrust aside half truths and grasp the whole."

Summer Vegetables.

So many of our summer vegetables such as peas, string beans, squash, corn and roots are simply boiled and served with butter or milk. With the exception of cabbage and its kin, all vegetables should be cooked in as little water as possible and used in the sauce when serving as the flavor and mineral constituents are drawn out in the water during the cooking.

Boiling water should be used to cook all tender vegetables. Change the manner of their serving so that a variety is always on your table. When there is more of the liquid left in cooking vegetables than can be used in serving them, save it for soups, stews, and such dishes.

Gold Cake.

Cream half a cup of butter, add one cupful of sifted powdered sugar. Add alternately the beaten yolks of six eggs and the juice and grated rind of one lemon. To two cupfuls of flour add a half teaspoonful of salt and one teaspoonful of baking powder. Bake in a tube pan and ice with powdered sugar mixed to a paste with lemon juice and the strained yolk of an egg.

Fried Apples and Onions.

Put a slice or two of bacon in a frying pan and when fried crisp remove and add an onion sliced thin when it is yellow in color; add a cupful of sliced apple and cook all together until tender. A little sugar and salt may be added to season. Serve as a vegetable.

Squash Puffs.

Press dry cooked squash through a sieve, to each cupful add two tablespoonfuls of butter, four tablespoonfuls of milk, salt and pepper to taste, and two well beaten yolks. Mix well then fold in the stiffly beaten whites. Turn into a well buttered mould and bake in a moderate oven until the mixture is firm in the center. Turn out carefully and serve with a white sauce.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

DRUG HABIT IS SPREADING

Vice on Increase in England—Ingredients Vary From Chloral to Alcohol.

English society is becoming seriously exercised about the habit of taking drugs, which appears to be spreading more rapidly than ever, judging from some of the correspondence which is appearing on the subject. What was at one time the vice of the few is declared now to be the practise of many—worried business men, professional men, "cursed with brain fag," jaded society women and all the other ivctims of the killing rush of modern life.

A case is narrated in M. A. P. of a hospital nurse who recently applied for relief at an inebriates' home, confessing that she had not been really sober—that is to say, more or less under the influence of stimulant—for six years. A spell of unusualy heavy work had driven her to cocaine. Her holiday, which ought to have followed immediately, had to be postponed for some reason connected with the hospital work, and she continued taking cocaine until when relief came at last she found herself unable to give up her daily allowance of the drug. Sometimes she took brandy to relieve her craving for the drug, but always she returned. As in every other case, the gradual sapping away of the will power weakened her efforts to break the habit, and in the end her friends had to take the most drastic measures to force her into an inebriates' home. Here the habit was successfully broken after an agonizing painful "cure."

One woman who led a very busy social life used to take regularly a mixture of chloral, sal-volatile, brandy and soda, while another dosed herself with a mixture of sal-volatile and red lavender.

Another extraordinary case was heard of recently. Three specialists had been called in to examine a woman, and though all three agreed that she was suffering from overstimulation they were utterly unable to discover the cause of her symptoms. The mystery was not sovled until some one happened to mention that the woman kept a bottle of sulphate of quinine in her boudoir. She then confessed that she was simply suffering from excessive doses of quinine.

The stage, literature and art each contribute a large number to the victims of the drug and alcohol habits. Recently a once famous artist was found sleeping on the embankment, having falle nthrough every stage of depravity from occasional indulgence in morphia to sheer mania for alcohol.

Many men and women connected with the stage have fallen victims to the craving for stimulants, always with disastrous results to their professional reputations. One actress, for whom the critics had prophecied a brilliant career, commencced taking morphia during a nervous crisis. She was delighted with the immediate benefit she derived from the drug, and used it again and again. Before she or any one else had realized what was happening, the unfortunate woman had become a morphine-maniac. She not only made no progress in her art, but her acting was deteriorating rapidly.

Before the end came it had become impossible for her to obtain an engagement. No maanger could depend on her coming to the theater, and when she did put in an appearance it was only charitable to describe her acting as erratic. She became so reckless in her craving for stimulants that she drank eau de cologne, Florida water or anything else of an alcoholic nature. In this casae, at any rate, death came as a merciful release.

Alcohol Same as Work.

When you don't want to work, but you want to look as if you had worked, feel as if you had done a hard day's work and be in the same condition as though you had done a day's work, take a couple of drinks of whisky. Medical science has established to its own satisfaction the fact that alcohol has the same effect on the human body as a day's work.

Dr. William J. Wick, who lectured at Chicago recently on "The Action of Alcohol on the Different Organs of the Body, From a Scientific Standpoint," is the authority for this statement. Dr. Wick declared that experiments in two men, one of whom had had a few drinks and the other of whom had worked all day, had the same results.

"Alcohol tires the nerves and muscles," said Dr. Wick. "One glass of beer shows a marked effect on the nervous centers and gives a tendency to hasty and incoherent movements."

A STITCH IN TIME

Every form of cutaneous disease could be cured in its incipiency if a jar of Resinol Ointment were kept at hand. A little of this excellent Ointment applied in time will effectually ward off and cure a starting trouble which, if neglected, may prove a troublesome and often obstinate case of Eczema or other disfiguring skin disease. For burns, scalds, slight wounds, sores, eruption of poison ivy, sunburn, it is a quick and sure remedy, usually curing these troubles over night. To the unfortunate sufferer with Hemorrhoids (Itching or Inflamed Piles) resinol ointment is indeed a godsend. The intense pain and intolerable itching of this trouble is instantaneously relieved and a cure effected in a very short time.

The bath room or family medicine case is incomplete if not equipped with Resinol Soap and Ointment. They are most valuable accessories in every well regulated household, and can be obtained at any drug store.

Resinol Medicated Shaving Stick is also highly appreciated by men who regard a good complexion and a face free from pimples and blotches.

A Shipping Error.

The young duchess of Westminster, wife of the richest peer in England, recently gave birth to her third child, a daughter. Thus there is no heir to the immense Grosvenor fortune, Earl Grosvenor, the duchess' second child, having died at the age of four.

Apropos of all this, a rather cruel story is being told in Newport about Lady Ursula Grosvenor, the eight-year-old daughter of the young duchess.

A friend, the story goes, called at Eaton Hall, and as she sat in the drawing-room, little Lady Ursula entered.

"Oh, good afternoon," she said, gravely. "Mamma can't see any one today. She's upstairs with the new baby. They sent her, you know, a girl when she'd ordered a boy, and she's so upset that she's quite ill."

Try to Come Back.

Not long ago Lord Kinnaird, who is always actively interested in religious work, paid a surprise visit to a mission school in the east end of London and told a class of boys the story of Samson. Introducing his narrative, his lordship added:

"He was strong, became weak, and then regained his strength, enabling him to destroy his enemies. Now, boys, if I had an enemy, what would you advise me to do?"

A little boy, after meditating on the secret of that great giant's strength, shot up his hand and exclaimed: "Get a bottle of 'air restorer."

Slightly Confused.

All of us become confused and all of us mix our language sometimes, but the preparation of an old negro preacher's sermon was the greatest confusion of metaphors I ever heard, says a traveler. When the lengthy discourse was nearing its close and he had reached his "Twenty-third and lastly, brethren," he wound up by the following elaborate figure:

"Everywha, bredren, we see de Almighty—all down de untrodden paths of time, we see de footprints of de Almighty hand."—Human Life.

"NO FRILLS"
Just Sensible Food Cured Him.

Sometimes a good, healthy commercial traveler suffers from poorly selected food and is lucky if he learns that Grape-Nuts food will put him right.

A Cincinnati traveler says: "About a year ago my stomach got in a bad way. I had a headache most of the time and suffered misery. For several months I ran down until I lost about 10 pounds in weight and finally had to give up a good position and go home. Any food that I might use seemed to nauseate me.

"My wife, hardly knowing what to do, one day brought home a package of Grape-Nuts food and coaxed me to try it. I told her it was no use but finally to humor her I tried a little and they just struck my taste. It was the first food I had eaten in nearly a year that did not cause any suffering.

"Well, to make a long story short, I began to improve and stuck to Grape-Nuts. I went up from 135 pounds in December to 194 pounds the following October.

"My brain is clear, blood all right and appetite too much for any man's pocketbook. In fact, I am thoroughly made over, and owe it all to Grape-Nuts. I talk so much about what Grape-Nuts will do that some of the men on the road have nicknamed me 'Grape-Nuts,' but I stand today a healthy, rosy-cheeked man—a pretty good example of what the right kind of food will do.

"You can publish this if you want to. It is a true statement without any frills."

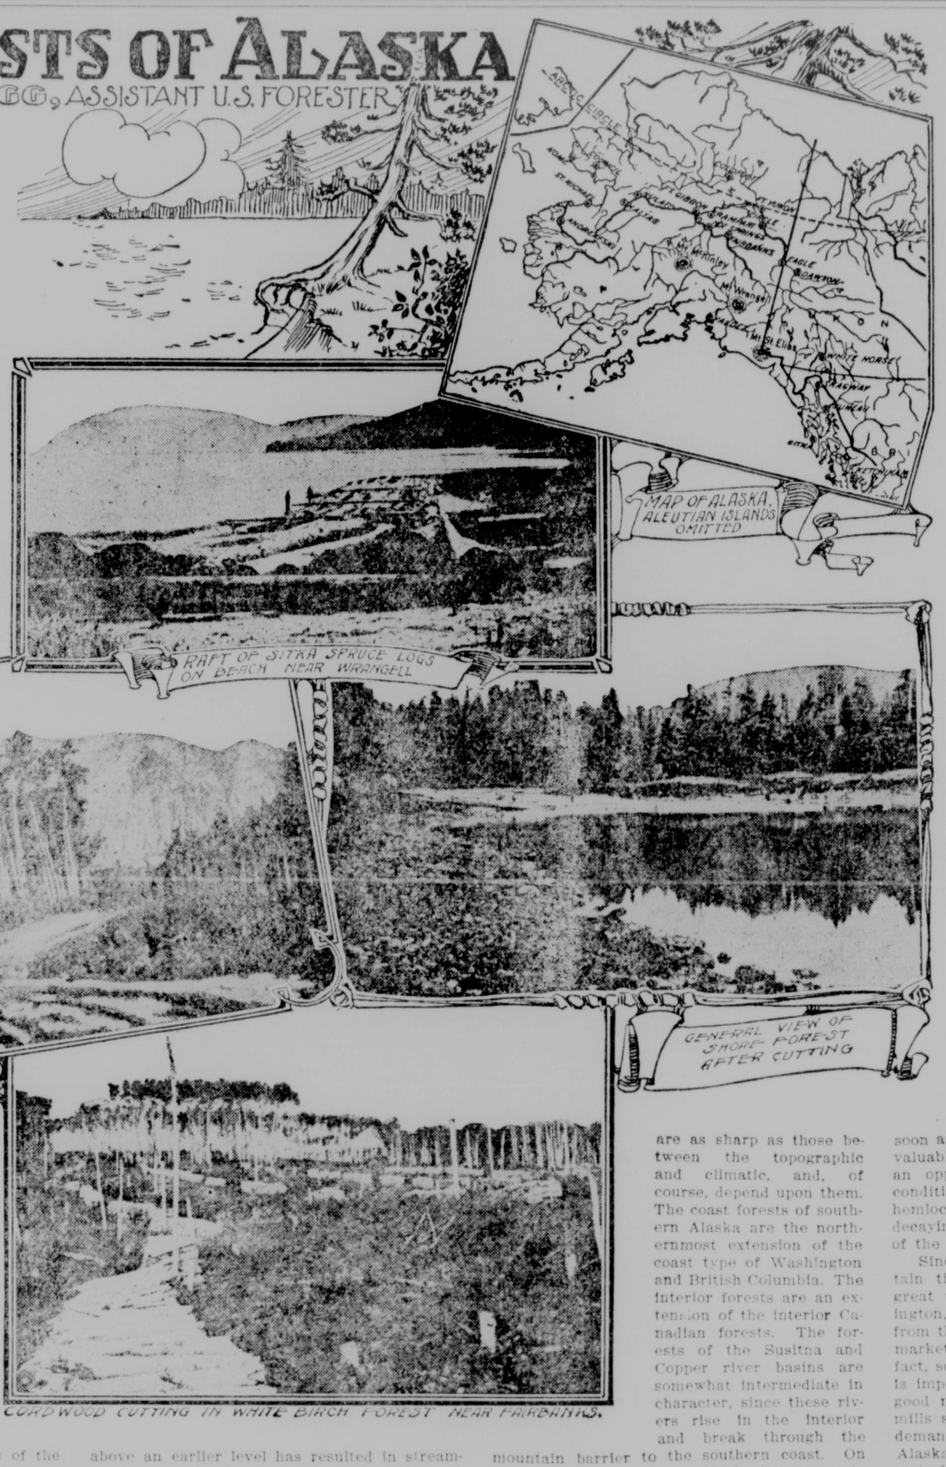
THE FORESTS OF ALASKA

By R. S. KELLOGG, ASSISTANT U. S. FORESTER.



THE ordinary resident of the United States has no conception of what Alaska really is. He has heard of the "Klondike" for the last 14 years, and he wrongly thinks it is in Alaska. He has heard of great glaciers and high mountains, and that somewhere the thermometer occasionally registers 80 degrees below zero. Beyond this his knowledge is likely to be even more fragmentary and unreliable. In reality, Alaska is on continental dimensions, and one can no more state briefly what its characteristics are than he can similarly describe those of the entire United States; yet a few words concerning its most salient features will not be amiss.

Alaska was purchased from Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000. The value of all its products since that date has been nearly $350,000,000. It has an area of 536,000 square miles, or 375,000,000 acres, or more than ten times that of the state of Illinois. From southeastern Alaska to the end of the Aleutian islands is as far as from Savannah, Ga., to Los Angeles, Cal. Its northernmost and southernmost points are as widely separated as Canada and Mexico. Its range of temperature is greater than that between Florida and Maine.

More than one-third of this immense territory is yet but little explored, despite the many years that it has been in the possession of the United States, and despite the active efforts of prospectors, of traders and of representatives of various branches of the national government. The permanent population at the present time is estimated at some 40,000 whites and 25,000 natives; about half of the latter are Eskimo in the region adjacent to Bering sea and the Arctic ocean. The most important product is gold, of which the output in 1908 was valued at more than $19,000,000. Fisheries rank second, and the salmon packed in 1908 had a value in excess of $10,000,000.

Most of the internal improvements of Alaska have been made by the war department. The telegraph system is constructed and operated by the signal corps, with offices at all important points. Transmission depends not only upon cable and land lines, but on high-power wireless stations as well. Roads are built chiefly by the corps of engineers of the war department. Railroads, except for short lines running out to a few mining camps, are utterly lacking, and the total railway mileage does not exceed 350. Transportation in summer is by steamboats on the larger streams and by poling boats on the smaller ones; in winter, by stages where the roads are good enough, and more generally by dog teams. Alaska has 4,000 miles of navigable rivers; without them most of the present development would have been impossible.

Alaska does not have even a territorial form of government, though during the past few years it has had a delegate in congress. Called a territory by courtesy, its anomalous standing for years was that of a customs district. It has executive and judicial officers appointed by the president and the senate, but no legislature; all legislation is by congress.

The United States geological survey recognizes four main divisions of the surface of Alaska. These are:

(1) The Pacific mountain system, which, in southeastern Alaska, is a continuation of the mountains of British Columbia, extends northwest to the Mount McKinley range, and then swings sharply to the southwest, with a prolongation far into the Pacific ocean, represented by the Aleutian islands.

(2) The central plateau region, which includes most of the Yukon and Kuskokwim basins.

(3) The Rocky Mountain system, which bounds the central plateau region on the north and northeast.

(4) The Arctic slope to the northward of the Rocky mountain system.

The Pacific mountain region is characterized on the coast by innumerable fiords and inlets, by deep inland passages and mountains which rise thousands of feet almost straight up from tide water. In the interior it culminates in Mount McKinley, the highest point on the North American continent. There is very little level land in this region, especially in the southeastern part. The mountains are great masses of rock and the upper parts of them are covered with perpetual snow and ice. On the coast many glaciers reach tide water, but in the interior they are confined to higher altitudes.

The central plateau region is not so much a plateau as it is a rolling hill and low mountain country with wide stream valleys. Its area is nearly as great as that of the other three combined. The raising of this region above an earlier level has resulted in stream-cutting, which obscures its original plateau character. It is in the extensive valleys and on the adjacent slopes of the Yukon, Tanana and Kuskokwim rivers and their tributaries that the interior forests reach their best development.

The Rocky mountain region is a comparatively narrow elongation of the Rocky mountain system of North America, and stretches across northern Alaska nearly from east to west. The mountains of this region reach a considerable though in no case a noteworthy height. On their southern slope head many streams which empty into the Yukon; those on the northern slope empty into the Arctic ocean.

The Arctic slope region, lying north of the Rocky mountain region, is composed of rolling tundras, in which truly Arctic conditions prevail. It has been less explored than any other portion of Alaska.

In many places in the interior the postglacial silts and sands form an excellent soil, and upon them whatever future agriculture there may be in Alaska will chiefly be developed.

The climate of the southern and southeastern coast region of Alaska is mild and wet. The annual precipitation at Juneau and Sitka is from 80 to 90 inches. At these points the precipitation is chiefly in the form of rain, and only during a short time in the middle of the summer are there likely to be days when rain does not fall. In the mountains immediately above tide water, however, the snowfall is very great. This increases to the northward, and at Valdez a winter's snowfall of nearly sixty feet has been recorded. The lowest temperature on record at Sitka is 4 degrees F. below zero, and the highest 87 degrees. At Juneau the lowest record is 10 degrees below zero, and the highest 88 degrees. The Sitka temperature is but little cooler than that of the northern part of Puget sound or of Scotland.

Sharply contrasted with the climate of southeastern and southern Alaska is that of the central plateau regions of the interior. The Pacific mountain system cuts off the warm, moisture-laden ocean winds so that the interior has a semi-arid continental climate subject to sudden changes and great extremes. Satisfactory records are lacking, but such as are available indicate an annual precipitation in the Yukon valley of about fifteen inches, including melted snow. As low as 80 degrees F. below zero has been registered in winter, and in the summer as high as 93 degrees. The summers are short and comparatively hot; the winters long and intensely cold.

Despite the low temperatures and long winters of the Yukon valley, there is ordinarily a good growing season of at least three months. During much of this time daylight is almost continual, and growth is rapid. This compensates in a marked degree for the shortness of the season; and since the evaporation is not great the vegetation is by no means of an arid character, notwithstanding the small precipitation. The frozen subsoil is practically impervious to water, which accumulates in poorly drained areas and causes the many swamps and "muskegs."

The differentiations between forest types are as sharp as those between the topographic and climatic, and, of course, depend upon them. The coast forests of southern Alaska are the northernmost extension of the coast type of Washington and British Columbia. The interior forests are an extension of the interior Canadian forests. The forests of the Susitna and Copper river basins are somewhat intermediate in character, since these rivers rise in the interior and break through the mountain barrier to the southern coast. On the coast of southeastern Alaska trees grow to large size; in the interior the timber is much smaller. The higher mountain areas are completely above timber line. Climatic conditions in the region adjacent to Bering sea and on the Arctic slope make forest growth altogether impossible, so there are great stretches of tundra whose vegetation consists chiefly of moss, sedges and a few small shrubs. Moss may be said to be the garment of Alaska, and layers of it 12 to 18 inches thick are not at all uncommon either on the coast or in the interior.

It is estimated that the total forest and woodland area of Alaska is approximately 100,000,000 acres, or about 27 per cent. of the land surface of the territory. Of these, about 20,000,000 acres may constantly bear timber of sufficient size and density to be considered forest in the sense that much of it can be used for saw timber, while the balance, or 80,000,000 acres, is woodland which bears some saw timber, but on which the forest is of a smaller and more scattered character and valuable chiefly for fuel.

There is not sufficient information upon which to base any satisfactory estimate of the total stand of timber in Alaska. It has been estimated, for instance that the coast forests contain 75,000,000,000 feet of merchantable saw timber, but this estimate might be much exceeded were both the spruce and hemlock closely utilized. More than twenty cords per acre have been cut in good stands of birch and aspen in the interior, but, on the other hand, there are large areas of black spruce that is too small to use for any purpose; so that it is still impossible to give a satisfactory estimate of the total stand.

The coast forests of southeastern and southern Alaska are nearly all included in the Tongass and Chugach National forests, which comprise 26,761,626 acres; and a large proportion of this area is forested. The species are chiefly western hemlock (Tsuga heterophylla), Sitka spruce (Picea sitchensis), western red cedar (Thuja plicata), and yellow cedar (Chamaecyparis nootkatensis). On the coast the timber line is low. On deer mountain at Ketchikan, for instance, spruce saw timber stops at about 1,500 feet, and the peak, with an elevation of 3,000 feet, bears only stunted black hemlock.

In the coast region the stand is generally dense, and as much as 25,000 feet per acre has been estimated for considerable tracts. Sitka spruce probably averages 20 per cent. of the stand, and western hemlock about 75 per cent. The spruce reaches a large size, and occasionally attains diameters of more than six feet and heights of 150 feet. Diameters of three to four feet are attained by western red cedar. While by far the most abundant species, western hemlock, does not produce as large individual trees as the spruce or the cedar.

Practically the entire forest of the coast region is overmature. It has been accumulating for ages uninjured by fire or cutting. Shallow, rocky soil, steep mountain slopes, or poor drainage often prevent thrifty growth, and on such sites "stagheadedness" and decay are common. In favorable situations the rate of growth of the coast trees is fairly rapid. The following are typical:

A western red cedar stump in good soil on the south slope of a gorge above Ketchikan showed 235 rings. The diameter of this stump outside the bark was 38 inches. A 40-inch Sitka spruce stump in the same locality had 230 rings. This tree had been 125 feet high. Near Wrangell three Sitka spruce logs averaged 32 inches in diameter at the butt inside the bark, with 262 annual rings. Two examples of extreme age in Sitka spruce were noted in Portage bay between Petersburg and Juneau. A section of a log 54 inches in diameter taken 25 feet above the ground had 600 rings; another log 54 inches in diameter 8 feet above the ground had 525 rings. Both were entirely sound.

Logging in southeastern Alaska employs the crudest of methods. It is now carried on entirely by hand, though logging machinery was used in a few earlier operations. Only the best spruce trees at the edge of tide water are cut. The logs are frequently made the entire length of the tree, and are jacked up and rolled into the water, where they are tied into rafts and towed to the sawmill by tugs.

The annual lumber cut in the coast forests of Alaska is about 27,000,000 board feet. This consists almost entirely of spruce, since hemlock is but little used. There are about 25 sawmills on the coast, at Cordova, Douglas, Juneau, Katalla, Ketchikan, Petersburg, Seward, Sitka, Valdez, Wrangell, and other points, most of them rather crude in character and of small capacity. A large proportion of the output, probably more than one-third, is used for salmon cases, and much of the best lumber goes into them.

The southern and southeastern coast of Alaska has a much greater timber supply than there is any reason to think will be needed locally for a long time to come. The permanent industries of the region are fishing and mining. The mountainous character of the country will forever prevent agricultural operations of any magnitude. The total stumpage is large, much of it overmature, and the proportion of hemlock too great. The timber should be cut and utilized as soon as possible and the spruce, which is more valuable than the hemlock, should be given an opportunity to increase. Under present conditions, with the well-known ability of the hemlock to reproduce under shade and upon decaying logs and debris, it has the advantage of the spruce.

Since the Alaska coast forests do not contain timber of either as high quality or as great variety as grows in Oregon and Washington, there is little likelihood that lumber from them will compete largely in the general market with lumber from those states. In fact, some lumber used in southeastern Alaska is imported from the Pacific coast states, but good management on the part of the Alaska mills should enable them to supply the home demand for common kinds of lumber. While Alaska may eventually export considerable material of this sort, it must continue to import timber like Douglas fir for heavy construction work. Utilization for other purposes than for lumber should be encouraged. The most promising of these is for pulp. Both the spruce and hemlock are undoubtedly good pulp woods, and, taken together, they comprise almost the entire forest.

The cutting which has so far taken place on the coast of Alaska has had small effect upon the forest. The bulk of it is yet untouched. Clearly, utilization should be encouraged as much as possible. With respect to the coast forests, there is little in the statement sometimes made, that the timber in Alaska should be held for the sole use of Alaskans. It should be manufactured into the most suitable forms and sold wherever it best can be marketed. Natural barriers, so far unsurmounted, prevent it from being of benefit to the interior, where the need is greatest and the price highest. Moreover, the coast forests are not capable of producing a great deal of the structural material that will be needed in the interior when the latter region is more fully developed and made accessible by railroads.

The annual growth of the coast forests is far in excess of the local needs, and unless methods of utilization are developed which will result in the export of forest products these forests cannot be handled rightly.

The forests of interior Alaska are practically all included within the drainage basin of the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers. They are chiefly of the woodland type, and are estimated to cover approximately 80,000,000 acres, but probably not more than 40,000,000 acres bear timber of sufficient size and density to make it especially valuable for either cord wood or saw logs.

Several times as much timber is used each year in the interior of Alaska for fuel as is used for lumber. The interior of Alaska depends entirely upon wood for heat, light and power.

Obviously all the forests of Alaska, whether on the coast or in the interior, should be protected and made of the utmost permanent use. The coast forests, which include most of the saw timber of the territory and by far the heaviest stands, are nearly all protected by national forests. They have not been damaged by fire and are but slightly reduced by cutting. They are overmature. Carefully planned cutting should take place as soon as possible. Every effort should be made to have them utilized for lumber, and especially for pulp. They should be so managed as to increase the stand of spruce and decrease that of hemlock. In the interior forests, situated entirely upon public lands, unregulated cutting and devastating fires are going on. The coast forests were reserved before they were impaired. Those of the interior have already been seriously damaged. Their protection cannot begin too soon. While the products of the coast forests need a foreign market, the interior forests with the best of treatment are not likely to supply more than a part of the home demand. If protected they will continue to furnish logs for cabins, low-grade lumber and fuel indefinitely. Higher grade lumber required by the interior must always be imported.

A MARVELOUS RECOVERY.

How a Chronic Invalid Regained Perfect Health.

Mrs. Ray Trusner, 30 West Third St., New Albany, Ind., says: "Kidney disease had rendered me a chronic invalid. I lay in bed unable to move hand or foot. My right limb was swollen to twice normal size. I looked the picture of death and my case puzzled the doctors. The kidney secretions were highly colored and scalded terribly. Marked improvement followed the use of Doan's Kidney Pills. In six weeks I was a well woman. My friends and relatives marvel at my recovery."

HOW A DOCTOR CURED SCALP DISEASE

"When I was ten or twelve years old I had a scalp disease, something like scald head, though it wasn't that. I suffered for several months, and most of my hair came out. Finally they had a doctor to see me and he recommended the Cuticura Remedies. They cured me in a few weeks. I have used the Cuticura Remedies, also, for a breaking out on my hands and was benefited a great deal. I haven't had any more trouble with the scalp disease. Miss Jessie F. Buchanan, R. F. D. 3, Hamilton, Ga., Jan. 7, 1909."

P. T. Barnum, the famous circus man, once wrote: "I have had the Cuticura Remedies among the contents of my medicine chest with my shows for the last three seasons, and I can cheerfully certify that they were very effective in every case which called for their use."

When the Fish Exploded.

Somebody discovered that fish are fond of gasoline, and this led to the idea of soaking worms in gasoline in order to make them more alluring when used for bait.

Mark the result.

Two of those gasoline-tempted fish exploded in the frying pan, and broke the kitchen window, and blew the cook's face full of mashed potato, and hurled the teakettle into the flour barrel, and painted the kitchen ceiling with stewed tomatoes.

Call it a lying world and let it go at that.

How It Was Named.

Nottingham lace was so called because it originally was made by the semi-savage people who lived in the caves in the district now known as Nottingham, in England. By keeping the work between them and the dark mouth of the cave the women could work the pattern easily. Nottingham, or any other lace, even the finest and filmiest, can be washed safely and quickly with Easy Task soap, which is a natural, scientific cleanser and leaves the lace in the best condition. Easy Task costs but five cents a cake at your grocer's.

Something Dreadful.

Wee Anita was listening to a story of the Johnstown flood.

"What made it?" she asked.

"Oh, the dam broke," replied grandma.

The next morning she ran into her brother's room and, climbing up on the bed, inquired anxiously: "Buvver, wasn't it just drefful 'bout that swear breaking and killing all dose people?"

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

COUNTY FAIR ASSOCIATION.

The movement for the organization of a County Fair Association for Garrett county, which was inaugurated last Saturday, is one which may be of great possibilities for our farmers if they will come forward and give it their encouragement and support.

The success which our county has met with in the recent exhibits of fruits and small grains sent to the annual exhibitions held in Baltimore, proved what we can do in Garrett if we only put forward the effort.

With the excellence of our products thus confirmed, nothing but good would result from the keen home competition which would be established under the guide of an association.

The present need of farmers is for closer cooperation and association and the adoption of intelligent methods of soil conservation and improvement, and nothing will bring this about sooner than seeing what others have done and can do. For the best results, the association should be popular and general and every farmer who can should join.

From our position upon the main line of the B. & O. Railway many exhibitors and visitors should visit our fairs each fall and in time we may hope to rival those of our eastern counties.

AN EARNEST CAMPAIGN.

More than anything else the Maryland Republicans need earnest campaigning. The Democratic party in this State is in no position to make an appeal to the people upon its record. It is in no condition to make a united fight. It has no basis for successful criticism of the Republican administration of the country, nor has the party generally any basis for promises of what it will do in case a Democratic house is elected. Such in general terms is the situation at present. It is too early in the campaign to predict the outcome in several of the districts, but it is not too early to impress the Republicans with the duty of organizing the fight in each district according to the conditions in that district, and at the same time not to make the fight in any district simply a district contest, devoid of the tremenduous leverage that is gained by action in unity all along the line. It would be a great mistake to have an individual fight with each candidate standing alone. It would likewise be a mistake to submerge the individuality of the candidate and the particular facts of his candidacy in the general contest.

The Republican party must impress the voter at large before it can make the voters in any close district rally to it with the response that it has the right to expect. Therefore, the Republican party needs to have the courage of its position, it needs to assert the strength of its arguments. There can be no question but that the practices of the Democrats in certain particulars, such as the trick ballot and the fake candidates, will cause the repudiation of the party if the Republicans will be aggressive and arouse the voters on the subject. The same may be said with regard to the record of Democratic rule in the city and State. The people have come to dread the development of Democratic confidence from successive victories, and they only need suitable encouragement to give the party warning through defeat of its congressional candidates of their intentions in the next local election.

The campaign is young yet, and there is time enough for forcing the fight, after the parties have made their declarations, and the contest has been given the definite character that these expressions will convey. It is very certain that the voters of Maryland will honor right expression, right aggression and right arguments.

Lest We Forget Nineteen Five and Nineteen Nine.

Now that we know who are our candidates for Congress, we may well inquire where these candidates, and more particularly where the Democratic candidates, stand on an issue which looms up before the people of Maryland as it did two and six years ago. In 1905 and again in 1909 we defeated by decisive majorities disfranchising amendments to our State Constitution; in 1911 we shall have the same work to do all over again. Will the Democrats who now ask us to send them to Washington be with us or against us in that work?

It should be remembered that neither the amendment so warmly opposed by Governor Warfield nor the amendment so warmly advocated by Governor Crothers received a majority of the white registered vote of the State, and it is more than doubtful whether either of them would have been indorsed by a fairly conducted Democratic primary; this is, to say the least, even more doubtful as to the amendment on which we shall vote next year. Moreover, it was not the resistance of Republicans or independents, but determined pressure from Democrats—from Democrats as "regular" as the easiest French verb—which persuaded Governor Crothers, at the last moment, to undo what had been done by the General Assembly to force through the new amendment without heed to law, decency or the people's will. So the mere fact that any candidate is a Democrat by no means tells us where he stands on this issue. He may be, indeed, one, or tool, of our local "Old Guard," which has so often sought to thus make tighter and more lasting its grip on its own party and on the State; but he may well be one of those Democrats (there are many more of them now than there were once) who will follow such leaders in such paths no longer.

For can it be a question for a rational mind whether the inquiry be pertinent to the candidates's fitness for the post he seeks. Thirty years ago a Democratic candidate for the Presidency happily described the tariff as "a mere local issue;" but, so far as I know, no one, not even a Democratic candidate for office, has ever described the supremacy of the Federal Constitution, the sanctity of official oaths of allegiance, the loyal acceptance of results of the Civil War, as "mere local issues." What our Federal lawgivers believe of these things interests the people of Maine, of Michigan, of Montana no less than the people of Maryland. In the words of Justice Wilson, used in Chisolm vs. Georgia, the questions we must determine, for the third time in Maryland, next year at the polls "may perhaps be ultimately all resolved into one no less radical than this: 'Do the people of the United States form a nation?'" Surely the people of the United States may reasonably ask us to find out how a man will answer this question before, through our votes, he shall become their sworn and paid servant, empowered, with his colleagues, to make laws which the whole Union must obey.

I hope, therefore, that every Democratic candidate for Congress this year in Maryland shall be publicly asked to say, categorically and frankly, whether he will support or oppose the disfranchising amendment in November, 1911. Of course, there is no reason why Republican candidates should not be asked the same question, if anyone thinks it needful. When we know where every man stands on this vital issue, we can think of others; we can ask what each has to say about "Uncle Joe," or the cause of the rise in prices, or the rates on rubber goods. It is of great moment that our country be not misgoverned, that the American nation have worthy public servants; but it is of greater moment that we still have a country to be governed either well or ill, that the people of the United States continue to form the American nation.

A Good Position

Can be had by ambitious young men and ladies in the field of "Wireless" or Railway telegraphy. Since the 8-hour law became effective, and since the Wireless companies are establishing stations throughout the county there is a great shortage of telegraphers. Positions pay beginners from $70 to $90 per month, with good chance of advancement. The National Telegraph Institute operates six official institutes in America, under supervision of R. R. and Wireless officials and places all graduates into positions. It will pay you to write them for full details at Cincinnati, O., or Philadelphia, Pa.

REPUBLICANS ARE HUSTLING TO WIN

Already at Work at the Several District Headquarters.

The Republican organization is not losing any time. District headquarters are already in full swing and preparations are being made for the registration. To get the names of the voters on the books is probably the most important work in a campaign, the battle being halt won by the party that is more successful in this respect. It is always difficult to arouse the voters to the necessity of registering, even when there is an election in which there is great popular interest. Again, the organization is materially aided in its work by the candidates, and if there are many of these, it is all the better.

In providing for biennial registration in this city the legislature, in its wisdom, selected what is known as an off year for a new enrollment. Only one office is to be filled, and while this, from the national standpoint, is just as important as any other, it is extremely difficult to convince the voters of the fact. It has been the experience of both parties that even with employed runners the voters are backward in responding, and the executives themselves are obliged to importune citizens to render themselves eligible to exercise the right of franchise.

Realizing the difficult proposition they are up against the Republicans deem it wise to organize their forces at once so as to be in position to begin the work when the books are opened. The one drawback is the lack of funds necessary for the employment of men to look after the voters. Contributions for this purpose are always slow and the candidate is frequently obliged to go down into his jeans to defray expenses. In political circles the registration is regarded as one of the most expensive features of a campaign.

There will be a supplementary registration next spring prior to the municipal election, and a revision preceding the state election, but the real work must be performed this year, the gathering of the odds and ends being comparatively easy. Republicans are very much encouraged over the vote cast at the primaries, which, while small when compared with that of the Democrats, came out voluntarily, no money being used to enthuse the precinct workers. The reports to be made by the political agents of the two parties will show that the Democrats spent very much more than their opponents. Besides, the fight in their ranks was very much more bitter.

In the counties this trouble was avoided by the legislature. Provision has been repeatedly made for a new registration, but this was repealed at the following session, so that the old books continue to be used from year to year, the lists being revised each time. Both parties are, however, watchful of their respective voters, and also keep track of those belonging to the opposition, and in this way they manage to keep their books up to date.

It is the aim of the Republicans to swell their lists in the state as well as in the city, and the two organizations will work in harmony to bring about this result. That the conditions in Maryland are favorable to Republican success is the opinion of Chairman Hanna, who has made a careful review of the situation. He predicts some surprises in Democratic strongholds.

In the Sixth district, where Republicans were at odds, they are now working in unison. Congressman Pearre and his friends are Republicans of the regular stripe, and they may be depended upon to give the candidate hearty support. Mr. Warner made a game fight for the nomination, and having won it fairly he deserves endorsement. The fact that his opponent carried three of the counties does not make his victory any less certain. The law governed the election and the law is supreme. Mr. Warner will carry every county in the Sixth district except possibly Montgomery, and here he is confident he can cut down the Democratic majority to a minimum.

That Mr. Warner owes his nomination to Judge Motter is generally admitted. It was the sweeping majority in Frederick county that pulled him through. Here the local organization was solid, while in other counties it was divided. Since his achievement, Judge Motter's name has been mentioned in connection with the gubernatorial nomination, but the jurist announces emphatically he does not want this or any other office, nor would he accept one. Said he: "I have no inclination to pursue a public career after the expiration of my term of office. I am getting too old to enter any fight of the kind spoken of, and I positively would not consider the office." Concerning the late primary campaign, he said: "I was simply drawn into the struggle. I had no political aspirations in view, and I don't expect to engage in any political struggle whatever in the future."

Judge Motter has for years been the leader of the Republican organization in Frederick county and has suffered few defeats, either at primaries or at elections.—Baltimore American.

DECISION OF THE STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION

In the Case Appealed by Mr. Palmer From the Local Board.

The record in this case contains a mass of irrelevant matter, but the essential facts are few and simple.

The appellant, Mr. U. G. Palmer, on the 29th day of June, 1908, was duly appointed as principal of the Oakland Public Schools, then composed of the usual high school and elementary grades, and claims that he is still the principal of said schools.

On the 24th of June last, however, the board of county school commissioner passed the following order:

"The Board decided to separate the High School and the Grammar School, and to put the High School in the Old Court House with H. A. Loraditch, principal."

The appellant contends that the effect of this order, if sustained, will displace him as principal of the schools, and put another in charge of the work which he was employed to perform.

Mr. Palmer denies that the board of county school commissioners has authority to remove him from office in such manner, and brings this appeal in order to have that question determined.

The board of county school commissioners, on the other hand, contends that it had authority under the school law, as amended by Chapter 386 of the Acts of 1910, and that such action was necessary in order to enable the board to establish a high school under said Act.

The Act referred to reads as follows:

"The board of county school commissioners of any county shall have the authority to establish high schools, subject to the approval of the State Board of Education, in their respective counties, when, in their judgment, it is advisable to do so. All high schools so established and those now in operation shall be under the direct control of the several boards of the the county school commissioners, subject to the provisions of this Article, provided that when instruction below that of the high school grades is given in the same building, or on the same premises, such grade work may also be under the direct control of the board of county school commissioners, and the principal of the high shhool shall also be principal of the elementary department."

The manifest design of this change in the law was to provide a new scheme for the establishment of high schools for the counties, and to place all high schools under the "direct control" of the board of county school commissioners in each county, "subject to the provisions of" Article 77 of the Code. The effect of giving such direct control, in the case of high schools, was to take certain powers out of the hands of district school trustees and confer them upon the boards of county school commissioners, and to require such boards to perform the new duties so committed to them as district school trustees were required to perform them under the law as it existed before the passage of the Act of 1910, Chapter 386. In other words, the commissioners were to take direct control, but were required to exercise such control subject to existing provisions of the school law.

Now, Section 53 of the said Article provides that "principal teachers shall be appointed by the board of district school trustees, subject to confirmation by the board of county school commissioners; and said teachers may be removed at any time said board of district school trustees may think proper, after thirty days' notice in writing; provided, further, that said board of district school trustees shall furnish, in writing, when required by the teacher so notified, the reasons for dismissal," and makes provision for an appeal so that the sufficiency of such reasons may be determined. As this Section was not repealed by the Act of 1910, it is still in force, as one of the "provisions of this Article," and, when commissioners assume their new duties as trustees of high schools, they must observe the provisions of law governing trustees of other schools, to the extent that such provisions can be made to apply.

The rights and privileges secured to principal teachers by Section 53 are too valuable, both to the teachers and to public school interests generally, to be construed away and destroyed upon the mere assumption that the Legislature, by giving direct control in such cases, meant to give absolute control, and by implication, repeal a provision of law so vitally important. In the absence of some clear and unequivocal declaration to be found in the Act itself, we do not feel justified in assuming that it was the intention of the Legislature to sanction a return to the conditions, usages and abuses as they existed before the passage of the law embodied in said Section 53, the effect of which was to establish a stable and permanent tenure of office, dependent solely upon merit and efficiency, to create a feeling of security in the minds of teachers themselves, and to add immensely to the dignity and influence of their positions. By offering to those who aspired to become professionally trained teachers a strong incentive to educate themselves for teaching as their life work, and not to resort to teaching in the public schools as a temporary employment to be abandoned whenever the opportunity to secure work in other fields presented itself, this provision of our school law has elevated and improved the character of the work done in all of the public schools, and given to the teacher himself a standing and influence in the community in which he lives that furnish the best reasons for the conclusion that it was not the intention of the Legislature to deprive high school principals of any of the rights thereby secured to all other principals in the public school service of the State. No reason for such a distinction has been assigned, and, it is believed, none can be assigned.

The necessary effect of the order of June 24th, if enforced, will be to remove the appellant as principal of the high school department. This being so, it must be regarded as a formal proceeding to dismiss him, and as no notice was given until the 10th of August, such notice came after, and not before, the order so passed.

After the passage of said order, the reasons for appellant's removal were promply requested, but those furnished by the board are, on their face, stated to be "reasons for appointing Prof. Loraditch," and not reasons for removing the appellant.

It appearing, therefore, that the order of June 24th was prematurely passed, without notice to the appellant, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the reasons assigned, and we hold that said order of June 24th, appealed from in this case, is without legal effect, so far, at least, as the rights and standing of this appellant are concerned, and that he is still in office as principal teacher of the Oakland Public and High Schools.

Married.

BROWNING—FOREMAN—Miss Loretta Foreman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James M. Foreman, North Centre street, Cumberland, and Mr. Frank L. Browning, of Oakland, a main line Baltimore and Ohio railroad engineer running between Cumberland and Grafton, were married Wednesday morning at 6 o'clock at SS. Peter and Paul's Catholic church, Cumberland, at a nuptial mass celebrated by Rev. Father Benedict, who blessed the wedding ceremony. Miss Mamie Habig was maid of honor and Mr. Elwood Foreman, brother of the bride, was best man. Following the ceremony a wedding breakfast was served at the home of the bride's parents where the dining room and parlors had been handsomely decorated by the girl friends of the bride. Mr. and Mrs. Browning left on B. & O. train No. 2 for Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and a trip up the Hudson river and to Niagara Falls, to be gone two weeks. They will be at home to their friends in Cumberland on and after October 1st. The out-of-town guests were Miss Mary Foreman, of Mt. Savage; Miss Ethel Foreman, of Everett, Pa.; Mrs. Helbig, Miss Browning and Mr. William Browning, sisters and brother of the groom, of Oakland. Mrs. Browning received many handsome and costly presents. She is quite well known in a large circle of acquaintances and is a charming and vivacious young lady.—Cumberland News.

HITCHINS—ODER—Mr. Jas. J. Hitchins, of Frostburg, son of the late Owen Hitchins, and Miss M. Eloise Oder, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Benson Oder, surprised their friends by coming to Oakland, where they were married last Thursday evening by Rev. G. R. Williamson, pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. The bride's father is the editor of the Frostburg Mining Journal. Mr. and Mrs. Hitchins have returned to Frostburg.

MEESE—HANSELL—At the home of the groom's mother, Mrs. Mary Meese, Thursday evening, Sept. 15th, by Rev. G. W. Hobbs, of the Lonaconing M. E. church, Miss Maud E. Hansell, of near Lonaconing, and Mr. John W. Meese, of Barton, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony. The attendants were Miss Florence Meese and Mr. Hugh Meese, sister and brother of the groom. The bride is a daughter of Mr. W. P. Hansell and is a very beautiful and popular young lady. The groom is one of Barton's most successful business men.

GIESSMAN—THAYER.—On Tuesday evening at Loch Lynn Heights, by Rev. W. H. Hudson, pastor of the Baptist church at that point, Miss Mabel Thayer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John O. Thayer, of Thayerville, and Mr. Blaine Giessman, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Giessman, of Oakland. The couple are excellent young people and are well and favorably known in all sections of the county. We extend congratulations and wish them a long and prosperous married life.

CHISHOLM—BROWNING—At the residence of the bride's parents, near Thayerville, Wednesday evening, September 21st, by Rev. G. R. Williamson, pastor of St. Paul's church, Oakland, Miss Grace, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Browning, and Mr. James Chisholm, formerly of Garrett county, but now a resident of Hagerstown, where he is employed as an engineer by the B. & O. R. R. The bride is a charming young lady of many accomplishments and the groom is a splendid young man. After the ceremony the party came to Oakland where they took train No. 4 for the east.

The committee composed of members of the several sub-districts of Oakland District M. E. church appointed some months ago to select a site and determine where a residence should be erected for the home of the District Superintendent, met in Oakland Tuesday when the vote was almost unanimous for Oakland as the best located point for the building. Following this action of the committee options were secured from the owners of several dwellings in Oakland, but definite action has been deferred until later.

Dr. J. W. Ricketts, recently of Baltimore, now practicing his profession at Accident, where he has become quite popular as a physician, was in Oakland Monday evening on business, returning home the same night with State Senator Spiecher, who arrived in Oakland earlier in the day, having brought Senator and Mrs. R. A. Ravenscroft, daughter and son here in his automobile and who returned to Baltimore Monday afternoon after spending the summer at their Accident home.

Elmer Haulenbeek is quite ill at his home in Baltimore. He was taken sick about ten days ago as he was on the point of taking his customary Saturday trip to Deer Park. His wife went to Baltimore at once, and both are there now. Just as soon as he is able to travel Mrs. Haulenbeek will take her husband to Ocean City, N. J., a friend of the family having tendered them the use of their cottage. After a period at the seaside Mr. Haulenbeek will be brought to his Deer Park residence before resuming his duties in the B. & O. Real Estate Department at Baltimore. Miss Irene Haulenbeek went to Baltimore Tuesday with Elmer Haulenbeek, Jr.

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. Amidst numerous difficulties the servants deserted. As Miss Innes locked up for the night she was startled by a dark figure on the veranda. Unseemly noises disturbed her during the night. In the morning Miss Innes found a strange link cuff-button in a hamper. Gertrude and Halsey arrived with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. The link cuff-button mysteriously disappeared. Detective Jamieson arrived. Gertrude revealed she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room a few moments before the murder. Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped down a laundry chute. Gertrude was suspected. A negro found the other half of what proved to be Jack Bailey's cuff-button. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey left in response to a telegram. Gertrude said she had given Bailey an unloaded revolver, fearing to give him a loaded weapon. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Halsey said Armstrong wrecked his own bank and could clear Bailey. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, was found at the lodge. The lodgekeeper said Louise and Arnold had a long talk the night of the murder. Louise was prostrated. Louise told Halsey, that while she still loved him she was to marry another, and that he would despise her when he learned the whole story. It developed that Dr. Walker and Louise were to be married. A prowler was heard in the house. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Louise said she had heard a knock at the door and answered it. Something brushed past her on the stairway and she fainted. Bailey is suspected of Armstrong's murder. After "seeing a ghost," Thomas, the lodgekeeper, was found dead. A slip was found in his pocket bearing the name "Lucien Wallace, 14 Elm street, Richfield."

CHAPTER XX.—Continued.

"Certain."

"In what part?"

"In the east wing."

"Can you tell me when these intrusions occurred, and what the purpose seemed to be? Was it robbery?"

"No," I said decidedly. "As to time, once on Friday night a week ago, again the following night, when Arnold Armstrong was murdered, and again last Friday night."

The doctor looked serious. He seemed to be debating some question in his mind, and to reach a decision.

"Miss Innes," he said, "I am in a peculiar position; I understand your attitude, of course; but—do you think you are wise? Ever since you have have come here there have been hostile demonstrations against you and your family. I'm not a croaker, but—take a warning. Leave before anything occurs that will cause you a lifelong regret."

"I am willing to take the responsibility," I said coldly.

I think he gave me up then as a poor proposition. He asked to be shown where Arnold Armstrong's body had been found, and I took him there. He scrutinized the whole place carefully, examining the stairs and the lock. When he had taken a formal farewell I was confident of one thing. Dr. Walker would do anything he could to get me away from Sunnyside.

CHAPTER XXI.

Fourteen Elm Street.

It was Monday evening when we found the body of poor Thomas. Monday night had been uneventful; things were quiet at the house and the peculiar circumstances of the old man's death had been carefully kept from the servants. Rosie took charge of the dining room and pantry, in the absence of a butler, and, except for the warning of the Casanova doctor, everything breathed of peace.

Affairs at the Traders' bank were progressing slowly. The failure had hit small stock-holders very hard, the minister of the little Methodist chapel in Casanova among them. He had received as a legacy from an uncle a few shares of stock in the Traders' bank, and now his joy was turned to bitterness; he had to sacrifice everything he had in the world, and his feeling against Paul Armstrong, dead, as he was, must have been bitter in the extreme. He was asked to officiate at the simple services when the dead banker's body was interred in Casanova churchyard, but the good man providentially took cold, and a substitute was called in.

A few days after the services he called to see me, a kind-faced little man, in a very bad frock-coat and laundered tie. I think he was uncertain as to my connection with the Armstrong family, and dubious whether I considered Mr. Armstrong's taking away a matter for condolence or congratulation. He was not long in doubt.

I liked the little man. He had known Thomas well, and had promised to officiate at the services in the rickety African Zion church. He told me more of himself than he knew, and before he left I astonished him—and myself, I admit—by promising a new carpet for his church. He was much affected, and I gathered that he had yearned over his ragged chapel as a mother over a half-clothed child.

"You are laying up treasures, Miss Innes," he said brokenly, "where neither moth nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal."

I sent him home in the car, with a bunch of hothouse roses for his wife, and he was quite overwhelmed. As for me, I had a generous glow that was cheap at the price of a church carpet. I received less gratification—and less gratitude—when I presented the new silver communion set to St. Barnabas.

I had a great many things to think about in those days. I made a list of questions and possible answers, but I seemed only to be working around in a circle. I always ended where I began. The list was something like this:

Who had entered the house the night before the murder?

Thomas claimed it was Mr. Bailey, whom he had seen on the foot-path, and who owned the pearl cuff-link.

Why did Arnold Armstrong come back after he had left the house the night he was killed?

No answer. Was it on the mission Louise had mentioned?

Who admitted him?

Gertrude said she had locked the east entry. There was no key on the dead man or in the door. He must have been admitted from within.

Who had been locked in the clothes chute?

Some one unfamiliar with the house, evidently. Only two people missing from the household, Rosie and Gertrude. Rosie had been at the lodge. Therefore—but was it Gertrude? Might it not have been the mysterious intruder again?

Who had accosted Rosie on the drive? Again—perhaps the nightly visitor. It seemed more likely some one who suspected a secret at the lodge. Was Louise under surveillance?

Who had passed Louise on the circular staircase?

Could it have been Thomas? The key to the east entry made this a possibility. But why was he there, if it were indeed he?

Who had made the hole in the trunk-room wall?

It was not vandalism. It had been done quietly, and with deliberate purpose. If I had only known how to read the purpose of that gaping aperture what I might have saved in anxiety and mental strain!

Why had Louise left her people and come home to hide at the lodge?

There was no answer, as yet, to this, or to the next questions.

He Scrutinized the Whole Place Carefully.

Why did both she and Dr. Walker warn us away from the house?

Who was Lucien Wallace?

What did Thomas see in the shadows the night he died?

What was the meaning of the subtle change in Gertrude?

Was Jack Bailey an accomplice or a victim in the looting of the Traders' bank?

What all-powerful reason made Louise determine to marry Dr. Walker?

The examiners were still working on the books of the Traders' bank, and it was probable that several weeks would elapse before everything was cleared up. The firm of expert accountants who had examined the books some two months before testified that every bond, every piece of valuable paper, was there at that time. It had been shortly after their examination that the president, who had been in bad health, had gone to California. Mr. Bailey was still ill at the Knickerbocker, and in this, as in other ways, Gertrude's conduct puzzled me. She seemed indifferent, refused to discuss matters pertaining to the bank, and never, to my knowledge, either wrote to him or went to see him. Gradually I came to the conclusion that Gertrude, with the rest of the world, believed her lover guilty, and—although I believed it myself, for that matter—I was irritated by her indifference. Girls in my day did not meekly accept the public's verdict as to the man they loved.

But presently something occurred that made me think that under Gertrude's surface calm there was a seething flood of emotions.

Tuesday morning the detective made a careful search of the grounds, but he found nothing. In the afternoon he disappeared, and it was late that night when he came home. He said he would have to go back to the city the following day, and arranged with Halsey and Alex to guard the house.

Liddy came to me on Wednesday morning with her black silk apron held up like a bag and her eyes big with virtuous wrath. It was the day of Thomas' funeral in the village, and Alex and I were in the conservatory cutting flowers for the old man's casket. Liddy is never so happy as when she is making herself wretched, and now her mouth drooped while her eyes were triumphant.

"I always said there were plenty of things going on here, right under our noses, that we couldn't see," she said, holding out her apron.

"I don't see with my nose," I remarked. "What have you got there?"

Liddy pushed aside a half dozen geranium pots, and in the space thus cleared she dumped the contents of her apron—a handful of tiny bits of paper. Alex had stepped back, but I saw him watching her curiously.

"Wait a moment, Liddy," I said. "You have been going through the library paper-basket again!"

Liddy was arranging her bits of paper with the skill of long practice and paid no attention.

"Did it ever occur to you," I went on, putting my hand over the scraps, "that when people tear up their correspondence it is for the express purpose of keeping it from being read?"

"If they wasn't ashamed of it they wouldn't take so much trouble, Miss Rachel," Liddy said oracularly. "More than that, with things happening every day, I consider it my duty. If you don't read and act on this, I shall give it to that Jamieson, and I'll venture he'll not go back to the city to-day."

That decided me. If the scraps had anything to do with the mystery ordinary conventions had no value. So Liddy arranged the scraps, like working out one of the puzzle-pictures children play with, and she did it with much the same eagerness. When it was finished she stepped aside while I read it.

"Wednesday night, nine o'clock. Bridge," I read aloud. Then, aware of Alex's stare, I turned on Liddy.

"Some one is to play bridge to-night at nine o'clock," I said. "Is that your business, or mine?"

Liddy was aggrieved. She was about to reply when I scooped up the pieces and left the conservatory.

"Now then," I said, when we got outside, "will you tell me why you choose to take Alex into your confidence? He's no fool. Do you suppose he thinks any one in this house is going to play bridge to-night at nine o'clock, by appointment! I suppose you have shown it in the kitchen, and instead of my being able to slip down to the bridge to-night quietly, and see who is there, the whole household will be going in a procession."

"Nobody knows it," Liddy said humbly. "I found it in the basket in Miss Gertrude's dressing room. Look at the back of the sheet." I turned over some of the scraps, and, sure enough, it was a blank deposit slip from the Traders' bank. So Gertrude was going to meet Jack Bailey that night by the bridge! And I had thought he was ill! It hardly seemed like the action of an innocent man—this avoidance of daylight, and of his fiancee's people. I decided to make certain, however, by going to the bridge that night.

After luncheon Mr. Jamieson suggested that I go with him to Richfield, and I consented.

"I am inclined to place more faith in Dr. Stewart's story," he said, "since I found that scrap in old Thomas' pocket. It bears out the statement that the woman with the child, and the woman who quarreled with Armstrong, are the same. It looks as if Thomas had stumbled on to some affair which was more or less discreditable to the dead man, and, with a certain loyalty to the family, had kept it to himself. Then, you see, your story about the woman at the card-room window begins to mean something. It is the nearest approach to anything tangible that we have had yet."

Warner took us to Richfield in the car. It was about 25 miles by railroad, but by taking a series of atrociously rough short cuts we got there very quickly. It was a pretty little town, on the river, and back on the hill I could see the Morton big country house, where Halsey and Gertrude had been staying until the night of the murder.

Elm street was almost the only street, and number 14 was easily found. It was a small white house, dilapidated without having gained anything picturesque, with a low window and a porch only a foot or so above the bit of a lawn. There was a baby-carriage in the path, and from a swing at the side came the sound of conflict. Three small children were disputing vociferously, and a faded young woman with a kindly face was trying to hush the clamor. When she saw us she untied her gingham apron and came around to the porch.

"Good afternoon," I said. Jamieson lifted his hat, without speaking. "I came to inquire about a child named Lucien Wallace."

"I am glad you have come," she said. "In spite of the other children, I think the little fellow is lonely. We thought perhaps his mother would be here to-day."

Mr. Jamieson stepped forward.

"You are Mrs. Tate?" I wondered how the detective knew.

"Yes, sir."

"Mrs. Tate, we want to make some inquiries. Perhaps in the house—"

"Come right in," she said hospitably. And soon we were in the little shabby parlor, exactly like a thousand of its prototypes. Mrs. Tate sat uneasily, her hands folded in her lap.

"How long has Lucien been here?" Mr. Jamieson asked.

"Since a week ago last Friday. His mother paid one week's board in advance, the other has not been paid."

"Was he ill when he came?"

"No, sir, not what you'd call sick. He was getting better of typhoid, she said, and he's picking up fine."

"Will you tell me his mother's name and address?"

"That's the trouble," the young woman said, knitting her brows. "She gave her name as Mrs. Wallace, and said she had no address. She was looking for a boarding house in town. She said she worked in a department store, and couldn't take care of the child properly, and he needed fresh air and milk. I had three children of my own, and one more didn't make much difference in the work, but—I wish she would pay this week's board."

"Did she say what store it was?"

"No, sir, but all the boy's clothes came from King's. He has far too fine clothes for the country."

There was a chorus of shouts and shrill yells from the front door, followed by the loud stamping of children's feet and a throaty "whoa, whoa!" Into the room came a tandem team of two chubby youngsters, a boy and a girl, harnessed with a clothes-line, and driven by a laughing boy of about seven, in tan overalls and brass buttons. The small driver caught my attention at once; he was a beautiful child, and, although he showed traces of recent severe illness, his skin had now the clear transparency of health.

"Whoa, Flinders," he shouted. "You're going to smash the trap."

Mr. Jamieson coaxed him over by holding out a lead pencil, striped blue and yellow.

"Now, then," he said, when the boy had taken the lead pencil and was testing its usefulness on the detective's cuff, "now then, I'll bet you don't know what your name is!"

I Could See the Mortons' Big Country House.

"I do," said the boy. "Lucien Wallace."

"Great! And what's your mother's name?"

"Mother, of course. What's your mother's name?"

And he pointed to me! I am going to stop wearing black; it doubles a woman's age.

"And where did you live before you came here?" The detective was polite enough not to smile.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

By REV. STEPHEN PAULSON
Pittsburg, Pa.

Text: Our citizenship is in heaven.—Phil. 3:20.

In founding this republic our fathers established five institutions that seemed necessary to the development of a high order of manhood. Since here the common people were to be rulers it was plainly necessary to educate the multitude. No inventor commits his invention into the hands of an ignorant man, and our fathers feared to trust those powerful political tools, the ballot and free speech, into the hands of ignorant and untrained men. So they established the free school.

They also founded the free press; believing that the citizen should be made acquainted with all that goes on in God's great world, that our people should not be ignorant peasants but citizens of the world. The result is the intelligent unity of a hundred million people and the breaking down of all sectional differences.

They also established liberty and political equality. Not that all men are equal in strength of body or quality of intellect or power of personality, but that each man has an equal right to justice and self-development. The grass, the lily, and the oak are not equal in station, and, perhaps, not equal in usefulness, but are equal in their right to claim from soil and rain and sun what they need for growth and sustenance.

Our fathers emphasized the family, recognizing that all subsequent relationships are made or marred in the family circle. They looked upon this home as a miniature republic and they looked to earnest mothers for the sturdy and honest citizenship of the future.

The founders of the republic also believed most emphatically in a free church. They decreed that the Lord's day should be a training day for the soul and conscience that men might grow fine and strong, and that great and true convictions might be developed. For the measure of power of a republic is not in its resources and wealth, but in the quality of manhood produced.

We have today many problems before us, as there always will be great problems before a growing and progressing nation; but our greatest need is a Christian citizenship. We need men who live and act the principles of Jesus Christ in our high offices, in places of responsibility, in the great marts of business. That it will be so, it is not an idealist's dream, but will be a realization of the future to which present indications point.

In a despotism where one family rules, the task of educating the rulers is simple. It means the teaching of the members of a single family. In a monarchy it means the education of a few thousand of the upper classes. In a republic the great peril is moral ignorance among millions, many of them newly come to our shores. We have established our public schools for the training of the intellect, but unfortunately we have eliminated morals and spiritual knowledge from the class room. Five or six hours every week are given to mathematics for years, because we must count money, and weigh sugar and salt, compute coal and measure land. Years for the study of mathematics; not one minute for the training of a child's morals and character. The president of the National Educational association affirmed in his annual address that there are ten millions of young people under 17 who never cross the threshold of a church.

We teach children that two and two make four, but not that it is wrong to falsify accounts. We teach them that fire burns in science, but not that the boy who tries to satisfy his desire for pleasure with sin, is like one who eats red-hot coals. We teach the girl that hot water scalds, but we do not tell her that there are passions which indulged in will blight her very soul. Look at the jails filled with boys whom we allow to grow up like vandals. Consider the prisons crowded with young criminals. Look at the moral insensibility among our rich men and legislators, to whom truth and justice should be sacred.

We breed our own dangers through neglect. We spend vast energy in the discussion of the tariff on pig iron, as if with it the republic would survive of perish; but we neglect the souls of men. We spend hundreds of millions digging mud out of the rivers, while the mouths of our children spout mud, and the tenement houses ooze disease and crime. Surely there never was a time in the history of the republic when the influence and work of the church was needed more than it is today. We have well known examples of how gladly people flock to the standard of any man who shows himself a sturdy, uncompromising Christian citizen. And on the other hand we see that a man who is not a Christian, though he may be exalted to a high place, is soon weighted and found wanting.

Our fathers laid well the foundations, but their work cannot be perfected without the fidelity of the sons. We have a marvelous heritage; we reap what we did not sow. But God forbid that we should prove faithless to the principles of our fathers. So let us on this day call the roll of conviction which lie deep-rooted in true citizenship; and the first truth that meets us is that a man must be a citizen of the kingdom of God before he can be a true citizen of a Christian nation

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Need Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Brookfield, Mo.—"Two years ago I was unable to do any kind of work and only weighed 118 pounds. My trouble dates back to the time that women may expect nature to bring on them the Change of Life. I got a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it made me feel much better, and I have continued its use. I am very grateful to you for the good health I am now enjoying."—Mrs. SARAH LOUSIGNONT, 414 S. Livingston Street, Brookfield, Mo.

The Change of Life is the most critical period of a woman's existence, and neglect of health at this time invites disease and pain.

Women everywhere should remember that there is no other remedy known to medicine that will so successfully carry women through this trying period as Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from native roots and herbs.

For 30 years it has been curing women from the worst forms of female ills—inflammation, ulceration, displacements, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, and nervous prostration.

If you would like special advice about your case write a confidential letter to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. Her advice is free, and always helpful.

WHERE HE SAVED MONEY.

"You say it costs less to run this automobile than that trotting horse you owned?"

"Yes; I used to bet on the trotting horse."

A Liking for "Hamlet."

"Do you like Hamlet?" asked the hostess of her unlettered, if gushing, guest.

"Indeed I do," ws the reply. "I am excessively fond of it, but I always prefer a savory to a sweet one."

There was a momentary confusion, and then the hostess realized that the admiration of the guest was of a culinary, not literary, character.

"I gave her ham with an omelette for breakfast next morning," said the hostess, when telling the story.—Scraps.

Even the Children.

Ex-Governor Pennypacker, condemning in his witty way the American divorce evil, told, at a Philadelphia luncheon, an appropriate story.

"Even our children," he said, "are becoming infected. A Kensington school teacher, examining a little girl in grammar, said:

"'What is the future of "I love?"'

"'A divorce,' the child answered promptly."

INDEPENDENCE ON THE FARM

SPLENDID RESULTS FOLLOW FARMING IN THE CANADIAN WEST.

Americans In Canada Not Asked to Forget That They Were Born Americans.

Farm produce today is remunerative, and this helps to make farm life agreeable. Those who are studying the economics of the day tell us that the strength of the nation lies in the cultivation of the soil. Farming is no longer a hand-to-mouth existence. It means independence, often affluence, but certainly independence.

Calling at a farm house, near one of the numerous thriving towns of Alberta, in Western Canada, the writer was given a definition of "independence" that was accepted as quite original. The broad acres of the farmer's land had a crop—and a splendid one, too, by the way—ripening for the reapers' work. The evenness of the crop, covering field after field, attracted attention, as did also the neatness of the surroundings, the well-built substantial story-and-a-half log house, and the well-rounded sides of the cattle. His broken English—he was a French Canadian—was easily understandable and pleasant to listen to. He had come there from Montreal a year ago, had paid $20 an acre for the 320-acre farm, with the little improvement it had. He had never farmed before, yet his crop was excellent, giving evidence as to the quality of the soil, and the good judgment that had been used in its preparation. And brains count in farming as well as "braw." Asked how he liked it there, he straightened his broad shoulders, and with hand outstretched towards the waving fields of grain, this young French Canadian, model of symmetrical build, replied: "Be gosh, yes, we like him—the farmin'—well, don't we, Jeannette?" as he smilingly turned to the young wife standing near. She had accompanied him from Montreal to his far-west home, to assist him by her wifely help and companionship, in making a new home in this new land. "Yes, we come here wan year ago, and we never farm before. Near Montreal, me father, he kep de gris' mill, an' de cardin' mill, an' be gosh! he run de cheese factor' too. He work, an' me work, an' us work tarn har', be gosh! Us work for de farmer; well 'den, sometin' go not always w'at you call de' right, an' de farmer he say de' mean t'ing, be gosh! and tell us go to —well, anyway he tarn mad. Now," and then he waved his hand again towards the fields, "I 'ave no bodder, no cardin' mill, no gris' mill, no cheese factor'. I am now de farmer man an' when me want to, me can say to de oder fellow! you go——! Well, we like him—the farmin'." And that was a good definition of independence.

Throughout a trip of several hundred miles in the agricultural district of Western Canada, the writer found the farmers in excellent spirits, an optimistic feeling being prevalent everywhere. It will be interesting to the thousands on the American side of the line to know that their relatives and friends are doing well there, that they have made their home in a country that stands up so splendidly under what has been trying conditions in most of the northwestern part of the farming districts of the continent. With the exception of some portions of Southern Alberta, and also a portion of Manitoba and Southern Saskatchewan the grain crops could be described as fair, good and excellent. The same drought that affected North and South Dakota, Montana, Minnesota, Wisconsin and other of the northern central states extended over into a portion of Canada just mentioned. But in these portions the crops for the past four or five years were splendid and the yields good.

The great province of Saskatchewan has suffered less from drought in proportion to her area under cultivation than either of the other provinces. On the other hand, instead of the drought being confined very largely to the south of the main line of the C. P. R. it is to be found in patches right through the center of northern Saskatchewan also. In spite of this, however, Saskatchewan has a splendid crop. A careful checking of the averages of yield, with the acreages in the different districts, gives an average yield of 15½ bushels to the acre.

In Southern Alberta one-fifth of the winter wheat will not be cut, or has been re-sown to feed. There are individual crops which will run as high as 45 bushels on acres of 500 and 1,000 acres, but there are others which will drop as low as 15. A safe average for winter wheat will be 19 bushels. The sample is exceptionally fine, excepting in a few cases where it has been wrinkled by extreme heat.

The northern section of Alberta has been naturally anxious to impress the world with the fact that it has not suffered from drought, and this is quite true. Wheat crops run from 20 to 30 bushels to an acre, but in a report such as this it is really only possible to deal with the province as a whole and while the estimate may seem very low to the people of Alberta, it is fair to the province throughout.

When the very light rainfall and other eccentricities of the past season are taken into account, it seems nothing short of a miracle that the Canadian West should have produced 102 million bushels of wheat, which is less than 18 million bushels short of the crop of 1909. It is for the West generally a paying crop and perhaps the best advertisement the country has ever had, as it shows that no matter how dry the year, with thorough tillage, good seed and proper methods of conserving the moisture, a crop can always be produced.

As some evidence of the feeling of the farmers, are submitted letters written by farmers but a few days ago, and they offer the best proof that can be given.

Maidstone, Sask., Aug. 4, '10.

I came to Maidstone from Menominee, Wis., four years ago, with my parents and two brothers. We all located homesteads at that time and now have our patents. The soil is a rich black loam as good as I have ever seen. We have had good crops each year and in 1909 they were exceedingly good. Wheat yielding from 22 to 40 bushels per acre and oats from 40 to 80. We are well pleased with the country and do not care to return to our native state. I certainly believe that Saskatchewan is just the place for a hustler to get a start and make himself a home. Wages here for farm labor range from $35 to $45 per month. Lee Dow.

Tofield, Alberta, July 10, 1910.

I am a native of Texas, the largest and one of the very best states of the Union. I have been here three years and have not one desire to return to the States to live. There is no place I know of that offers such splendid inducements for capital, brain and brawn. I would like to say to all who are not satisfied where you are, make a trip to Western Canada; if you do not like it you will feel well repaid for your trip. Take this from one who's on the ground. We enjoy splendid government, laws, school, railway facilities, health, and last, but not least, an ideal climate, and this from a Texan. O. L. Pughs.

James Normur of Porter, Wisconsin, after visiting Dauphin, Manitoba, says: "I have been in Wisconsin 25 years, coming out from Norway. Never have I seen better land and the crops in East Dauphin are better than I have ever seen, especially the oats. There is more straw and it has heavier heads than ours in Wisconsin.

"This is just the kind of land we are looking for. We are all used to mixed farming and the land we have seen is finely adapted to that sort of work. Cattle, hogs, horses and grain will be my products, and for the live stock, prospects could not be better. I have never seen such cattle as are raised here on the wild prairie grasses and the vetch that stands three or four feet high in the groves and on the open prairie.

Sir Wilfred Laurier Talks to Americans.

Sir Wilfred Laurier, Premier of Canada, is now making a tour of Western Canada and in the course of his tour he has visited many of the districts in which Americans have settled. He expresses himself as highly pleased with them. At Craig, Saskatchewan, the American settlers joined with the others in an address of welcome. In replying Sir Wilfred said in part:

"I understand that many of you have come from the great Republic to the south of us—a land which is akin to us by blood and tradition. I hope that in coming from a free country you realize that you come also to another free country, and that although you came from a republic you have come to what is a crowned democracy. The King, our sovereign, has perhaps not so many powers as the President of the United States, but whether we are on the one side of the line or the other, we are all brothers by blood, by kinship, by ties of relationship. In coming here as you have come and becoming naturalized citizens of this country no one desires you to forget the land of your ancestors. It would be a poor man who would not always have in his heart a fond affection for the land which he came from. The two greatest countries today are certainly the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Republic of the United States. Let them be united together and the peace of the world will be forever assured.

"I hope that in coming here as you have, you have found liberty, justice and equality of rights. In this country, as in your own, you know nothing of separation of creed and race, for you are all Canadians here. And if I may express a wish it is that you would become as good Canadians as you have been good Americans and that you may yet remain good Americans. We do not want you to forget what you have been; but we want you to look more to the future than to the past. Let me, before we part, tender you the sincere expression of my warmest gratitude for your reception."

SUCCESS IN DEVELOPING PROFITABLE SHEEP FLOCK

Farmers Must First Get Away From Belief That Animals May Be Kept as Scavengers—Start With Well-Bred Ewes.

If we make a success of keeping a flock of sheep on our farms we must get away from the common belief that sheep may be kept as scavengers. While it is a fact that sheep will clean up weeds and briars, and manage to exist on poor pasture, yet this is only incidental.

If we keep a flock of sheep as scavengers they soon assume the appearanct that their purpose would signify. Their fleeces appear seedy and full of burrs and briars, and they show the effects of mismanagement and neglect.

A Pen of Southdowns.

It is best to start with a few well-bred ewes and the best ram that can be found at a reasonable price, and gradually build up a herd of fine ewes.

In this way the new breeder can make a closer study of the individuality of his sheep than he could if he was working with a larger number. A more intelligent selection could be made of the rams that were brought to mate with his ewes, and he could be all of the time increasing his knowledge of the business as the size of the flock increased, until he would be capable of wrestling with many of the more intricate problems that would come when the flock was nearing perfection. A great many fail with sheep because they undertake to work with too large a number.

Every sheep looks alike and they cannot make an intelligent study of the individuals that they are selecting and mating.

It takes considerable time for a man to train his eye and touch so that he can make intelligent selections even from his own flock.

When we observe the quality and study the conditions which surround the average farm flock we do not wonder that the majority of farmers make a failure of the sheep business.

It is really astonishing to note the waste of opportunities in the sheep business. Any intelligent farmer who is a student of the present economic conditions cannot fail to see that the future of the mutton growing and fattening business affords an attractive outlook for the farmer who is in a position to handle a farm flock of from one to two hundred well-bred ewes.

Relic of Barbarism.

A Texas paper views it this way: "Mud roads are a relic of barbarism and always indicate a people of slow and unprogressive habits. If a stranger should ride over all the roads of any county and find them all macadamized, he would be ready to bet on the superior intelligence and enlightenment of the people, whether he met a single one or not. The roads of this county can be greatly improved by the road drag and now is the time to do it."

IMPROVING THE POULTRY FLOCKS

Better Results Could Be Had if Farmers in Given Locality Would All Keep One Breed of Chickens.

The community idea might be worked a great deal more than it is in the pure-bred poultry business. Better results could be had if the farmers in a given locality would all keep one breed of poultry. If they would unite on some good, popular, easy selling breed, they would find buyers much more easily than where each man keeps a different kind of stock, says the American Cultivator.

With dairy cattle this plan has worked wonderfully well for certain groups of farmers in various parts of the country. In Wisconsin there is a dairy center, where almost everybody keeps Guernseys. In New York state there is a region where dozens of farmers keep Holsteins. In northern New Jersey there is another Guernsey center, and in various parts of the countr ythere are Jersey and Ayrshire dairy centers. In all these localities there are hundreds of pure-bred animals, which can be seen in a few hours. Such a condition becomes known all over the country, and buyers travel hundreds of miles, knowing that if they do not find just what they want at the first farm they visit they are likely to find it further on in the same neighborhood.

In southern Rhode Island breeders by an accidental way kept a native class of fowls which later were known as Rhode Island Reds. When this breed began to attract notice the region was visited by scores of buyers, who picked up every decent colored bird at fancy prices, putting thousands of dollars into the hands of the farmers that they could never have had expected for the demand at more than market prices.

If fifty farmers in a neighborhood would unite on almost any poultry breed there would be no difficulty in finding a market. A great many breeders with a reputation and a host of regular customers would be glad to know of a locality where they could buy what extra stock they need to fill their orders. The farmers could easily sell the stock themselves through one of their number or through one of the New York or Boston concerns which make a specialty of pure-bred stock in large quantities. It is not a very difficult matter for the farmer to learn to sell his stock on his own account. Fancy birds will almost sell themselves.

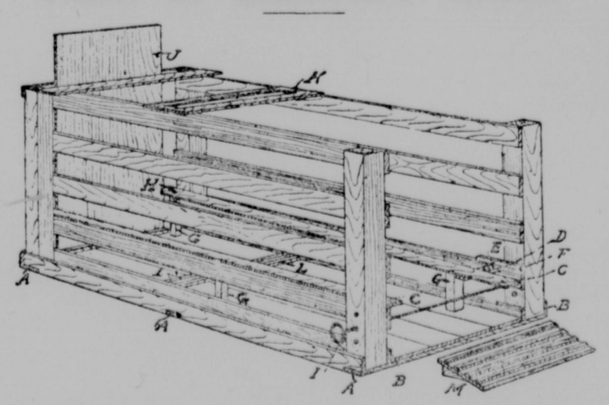
Progress and Improvement.

It is a well-known fact that in all dairy regions where dairying has been carried on for a number of years the farms are all in a high state of fertility and the farmers prosperous, with means for progress and improvements.

Best Ensilage.

Various kinds of roughage, such as clover, green oats, peas, etc., have been used for ensilage, but corn fodder makes the best. That is the almost universal verdict.

PLAN OF BREEDING CRATE



Only on a few farms are breeding-crates found. Where boars of different ages and sizes are used to mate with sows of different ages and sizes, a breeding-crate becomes necessary. In many cases farmers sell boars that have given excellent service and the best of pigs, simply because they were too large. This is a great mistake, and should be overcome by making breeding-crates. Nearly anyone can make a breeding-crate that is satisfactory, if he sets out to do so.. A plan is here given which may be adopted or used as a guide to model after in making a crate of one's own design.

Money in Sows.

Fifty dollars invested in two good sows will earn five times as much as the money would in interest on a mortgage.

ACCOMMODATING.

Harduppe—Say, you bumped into me and knocked me down with your auto and I want damages.

Showfurr—Oh, haven't you got enough? Well, start up and I'll bump and knock you again.

Active Possession.

Guinevere, aged four, was going out to walk with a young lady, of whom she was very fond. As they opened the street door they were met by a swirling cloud of dust, blown up from the thoroughfare.

"Keep your lips tightly closed, Gwen, or you'll get your lungs full of microbes," warned the young lady.

Guinevere pondered a moment and then, looking up, demanded:

"What are your crobes?"—National Monthly.

A Woman's Backbone.

History records many instances where a woman has shown that she possessed clear grit—commonly called backbone. She must have, to be able to half kill herself over a washtub every week. Women are learning now, however, that if they use Easy Task soap in the laundry it means half the work done while they rest, their clothes are cleaner and sweeter, their hands are not red and ugly, their flannels do not shrink and their linens do not rot.

Scandal.

Mrs. Simmonds glanced at the scare headline: "Bank Robbed! Police at Sea!" and laid down the sheet.

"Naow, look at that, Ez!" she ejaculated, repeating the headline aloud. "Here's a big city bank broke into by burglars, and th' city police force all off fishin' somewhere! What a scandal!"—Judge.

WESTERN CANADA'S 1910 CROPS

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Wheat Yield in Many Districts Will Be From 25 to 35 Bushels Per Acre

Land sales and homestead entries increasing. No cessation in numbers going from United States. Wonderful opportunities remain for those who intend making Canada their home. New districts being opened up for settlement. Many farmers will net, this year, $10 to $15 per acre from their wheat crop. All the advantages of old settled countries are there. Good schools, churches, splendid markets, excellent railway facilities. See the grain exhibit at the different State and some of the County fairs.

Letters similar to the following are received every day, testifying to satisfactory conditions; other districts are as favorably spoken of:

THEY SENT FOR THEIR SON.
Maidstone, Sask., Canada, Aug. 5th, 1910.
"My parents came here from Cedar Falls, Iowa, four years ago, and were so well pleased with this country they sent to Coeur d Alene for me. I have taken up a homestead near them, and am perfectly satisfied to stop here." Leonard Douglas.

WANTS SETTLER'S RATE FOR HIS STOCK.
Stettler, Alberta, July 31st, 1910.
"Well I got up here from Forest City, Iowa, last Spring in good shape with the stock and everything. Now, I have got two boys back in Iowa yet, and I am going back there now soon to get them and another car up here this fall. What I would like to know is, if there is any chance to get a cheap rate back again, and when we return to Canada I will call at your office for our certificates."
Yours truly, H. A. Wix.

WILL MAKE HIS HOME IN CANADA.
Brainerd, Minn., Aug. 1st, 1910.
"I am going to Canada a week from today and intend to make my home there. My husband has been there six weeks and is well pleased with the country; so he wants me to come as soon as possible. He filed on a claim near Landis, Sask., and by his description of it it must be a pretty place. My brother-in-law, Mr. Frank J. Zimmer, lives there and it was through him that we decided to locate in Canada." Yours truly,
Mrs. Richard Henry Ebinger.

TAKES HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW'S WORD FOR IT.
Taylors Falls, Minn., Aug. 7, 1910.
"I shall go to Camrose this Fall with my cattle and household goods. I got a poor crop here this year and my brother-in-law, Axel Nordstrom in Camrose, wants me to come there. He formerly lived in Wilton, North Dakota. I am going to buy or take homestead when I get there, but I do not want to travel two times there, for I take my brother-in-law's word about the country, and want to get your low rate." Yours truly,
Peter A. Nelson.

WANTS TO RETURN TO CANADA.
Vesta, Minn., July 24th, 1910
"I went to Canada nine years ago and took up a quarter section of railroad land and a homestead, but my boys have never taken up any land yet. I still hold the railroad land. I had to come back to the states on account of my health. Please let me know at once if I can get the cheap rates to Ponoka, Alberta." Yours truly,
Geo. Paskewitz,
Vesta, Minn.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

There was quite an exodus of summer residents from the Park this week. Among the number leaving for their winter homes we note the following: Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Carr, Dr. and Mrs. Logan Carr, Prof. and Mrs. John P. Hillis, Dr. and Mrs. J. R. McLain and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Frame and children, Mrs. Bishop and daughters, and Mrs. Comerford.

During the present season there has been a greater movement in real estate than for the past six years. Mr. C. W. Hopkins, agent, has disposed of four valuable properties as follows: The Conner cottage, opposite the drug store, to Mr. W. W. Edwards, of Washington, D. C.; the Woodcock cottage, on Hazel Glade drive, to Mrs. A. M. Thompson, of Bellefontaine, Ohio; the Cecil cottage, on G street, near the railroad, to Dr. Logan Carr, of New York, and Heartsease cottage, on E street, to Mrs. J. W. Travis, of Clarksburg, W. Va., who will likely spend most of the year here. Mr. Hopkins also sold the Sturgiss lot, on G street, to Mrs. E. R. Day, of Clarksburg, W. Va., who will erect a cottage in time for occupancy next season. Other transfers are being negotiated by Mr. H.

Lieut. E. S. West, as noted heretofore, sold the Allen cottage to Mr. E. L. Stone, of Wheeling, W. Va., who is having it extensively repaired.

The Mountain Lake Park Association also sold a number of lots, some of which will be improved.

Rev. John F. Goucher, the largest stockholder in the Mountain Lake Park Association, and his two unmarried daughters left Baltimore Tuesday for San Francisco, from where they will sail for China. Dr. Goucher and his daughters will be gone for ten months. He terms his trip as a "world mission" and he intends to visit many important countries and cities with a view to studying the religious movements. Dr. Goucher's tour was primarily brought about by the World's Missionary Convention, which was held this year in Edinburg, Scotland. He was placed at the head of a number of world-wide committees and in order to acquaint himself with the true situation in missionary fields he decided to take the trip to the Old Country.

Mrs. Martha Weimer, of The Colonial, is quite ill and is being attended by Dr. H. W. McComas.

Mrs. Annan, occupying the Dowler cottage, has been critically ill for two weeks. Her husband was summoned from St. Louis, Mo., and is still with her. Mrs. A. is receiving medical attention from Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh.

Miss Rose Wilson will soon leave her home here for California, where she will remain at least through the winter.

The electric light plant will shut down at the end of this month when Mr. Jno. D. Hayden, who has had charge, will take charge of the moving picture machine in Nalley's theatre.

Street Superintendent Cuppett has a force of men repairing the crossings and opening the ditches in order that everything will be in order before the rainy season comes.

Mr. R. T. Miller and family will spend the winter in Marietta, Ohio, where the boys are attending school.

The golf course has been surveyed and will be put in order by the opening of next season.

Preaching next Sunday evening at 8 o'clock.

FRIENDSVILLE.

These cold nights let us know that autumn is here.

Messrs. Shirk, Lincoln and Van Zant were visitors to our town last week. Now the coal will have to go.

Arnold Fox met with a bad accident last week when he fell and in trying to save himself broke both bones in his wrist.

George F. Frazee is very sick with neuralgia of the stomach.

There were no services in the M. E. church Sunday owing to the tearing up of the steps and their replacing by cement ones.

R. M. Holman is building a large extension to his warerooms.

Mrs. Orval Ross left Monday for Pittsburg where she will be treated in a hospital for spinal trouble.

John Holman returned to college last Tuesday.

Joe Deharam, of Addison, Pa., is the guest of his sister, Mrs. George Frazee.

Mr. and Mrs. John W. McCollough, accompanied by their youngest daughter and little son, have gone to Damascus, Virginia.

A. A. Allen and family left for Pennsylvania where they will reside in the future.

Miss Marie McCollough left Monday to attend College.

This summer we have had several parties of surveyors start in here and survey up the Yough. What and who they were they did not divulge, but lately it has been rumored that the last crowd who were peeping through their instruments were Wabash or Western Maryland men.

CHECK FORGER CAUGHT

Has Been Wanted by Authorities for Several Weeks.

John Carroll, colored, who forged the name of Col. J. M. Burns, of Mountain Lake Park, to a number of checks which he passed on a number of merchants in Oakland, was caught at Keyser yesterday afternoon by Mr. H. C. Sincell, one of his victims, who happened to be in that city on his way home from an automobile trip east.

Sheriff Shartzer was communicated with from Keyser and he went to that point immediately, arriving here last night with the prisoner who will remain the county's guest until the December term of the Circuit Court.

An Attractive Mission.

The mission this week in St. Peter's church is the big local attraction of the hour. A deep impression is being made on the general public. The crowds in attendance at the early morning masses, six and eight o'clock, tell the tale of faith and devotion on the part of the good people of St. Peter's parish.

The mission is being preached by a Father of the Order of St. Vincent from Philadelphia, the Rev. H. V. Piper, C. M. Father Piper comes of an old New England family, converts to the Catholic religion. The missionary himself was received into the church at a mature age. He is a man with a big heart, full of sympathy for humanity. He is endowed with superior intellectual powers and a generous nobility of soul. In all his preachings and contact with men his great kindness of heart is plainly manifest. In his opening address Sunday morning he stated that the teachings of the church which he came to preach are so ample, so beautiful, so powerful and so broad that he has no disposition or time to enter the field of the fault finder because of opinions held contrary to Catholic faith.

The subject of the sermon this evening will be, "The Marriage Tie."

The sermon Friday evening will be on "The Position of the Catholic Church on the Liquor Problem." Saturday evening the sermon will be on "The Divine Rights and Obligations of Parents in the Education of Their Children." The Sunday evening sermon will be announced Sunday morning. Sunday afternoon at three o'clock will take place in the church the blessing of little children and the sick, blind, lame and all physically indisposed. Everybody in Oakland is cordially invited and welcomed by the pastor, Father Connell, and the missionary, Father Piper.

GARRETT COUNTY'S OLDEST WOMAN HAS PASSED AWAY

Mrs. Eliza Royer, Aged Ninety-Six Years, Was Buried Sunday at Grantsville.

Mrs. Eliza Royer, aged ninety-six years, probably the oldest woman in Garrett county, died at her home near Grantsville on last Friday and was buried Sunday. Mrs. Royer was the mother of four children, among them being Rev. George A. Royer, of Loysville, Pa., a Lutheran minister who preached for some years at Accident and who was recently installed as pastor in his present charge. Mrs. Royer was the daughter of Adam Shultz, who was a resident of Grantsville from 1826 until his death which occurred in 1864. She was the only member of the Shultz family of eighteen children who remained in Garrett county, the others having left here many years ago and settled in and near St. Louis. Mrs. Royer's funeral occurred last Sunday and was conducted by Rev. L. P. Young, of Elk Lick, Pa., the interment being made in the Grantsville cemetery.

DR. H. L. BEVANS.

Dr. H. L. Bevans, a practitioner for many years of his profession at Grantsville, died on Sunday morning at his home in that town after an illness of a short time. He was aged about seventy-five years and had been a resident of Grantsville for upwards of half a century. He was well known in many sections of Garrett county.

COLUMBUS H. SHAW.

Columbus H. Shaw, a native of Garrett county, died in Pittsburg, Pa., last Thursday, following an accident which befel him in a coal mine near Salisbury, Pa., the day before. The deceased was a son of the late George Shaw, of Grantsville. He was an enterprising and successful business man.

MRS. ANNIE PORTER-FELTY.

Mrs. Annie Porter-Felty, wife of Mr. Christian Felty, of Connellsville, Pa., and daughter of the late Robert Porter, of Oakland, died at her home in Connellsville on Tuesday night at eleven o'clock after a brief illness. She was aged about forty-six years and was the mother of three children, two sons and one daughter. Her remains will arrive in Oakland on train No. 55 this afternoon and tomorrow morning at ten o'clock the funeral services will be conducted at the residence of the deceased lady's sister, Miss Mollie Porter, with interment in the Oakland cemetery.

B. & O.'S NEW EQUIPMENT

Last Instalment of New Equipment Has Been Delivered.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has just had delivered to it the last instalment of the large equipment order placed several months ago, including 240 Consolidation freight engines of the heaviest type, 26 Atlantic type passenger locomotives, 10,000 freight cars and 70 passenger coaches. With the arrival in Baltimore on Saturday of the last Consolidation engine from the Richmond Locomotive Works the order was completed and all of the equipment is in use on sections of the road in most urgent need of it. One of the exactions President Willard made of the successful bidders at the time the contracts were awarded was immediate delivery, and, considering the magnitude of the order, it is believed a record was made in filling it.

The Consolidation freight engines, which are the heaviest type of locomotive in use on American railways excepting the Mallet Articulated Compounds, are being used on the Baltimore and Ohio lines in West Virginia, Ohio and Pennsylvania coal regions. Several of the engines, of course, will be distributed to various other divisions of the road, but they are especially adapted to hauling long trains in mountainous districts. The weight of these engines is 220,300 pounds, capable of hauling a train of 6,000 tons on level track at 10 miles an hour.

The Atlantic type engines are designed for high speed passenger service and are now being used in crossing the Alleghany mountains with through express trains. These passenger engines are built to haul on level track a 50-car train of 25 coaches, 10 baggage cars, 8 postal cars and 7 Pullman sleepers at a speed of 40 miles an hour. They are said to be able to attain a speed of 80 miles an hour with an express train of the usual number of cars.

The Baltimore and Ohio has an outstanding order of equipment, contracts for which were placed recently, consisting of 10 Mallet and 50 Mikado type freight engines and 5,000 freight cars. The material to be used in this equipment is being assembled and it is expected that the plants having the contracts will begin delivery early in November.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

On every hand the remark is heard that more people have been at Mt. Lake Park this season than in any other year. The crowded condition of the hotels and cottages has given rise to the suggestion that another hotel is a crying necessity. The congestion of summer people at the Park this year has resulted in the suggestion that the Mt. Lake Hotel should be enlarged by the addition of a hundred room, fifty of which should have private baths. If this is not found practicable, a Wheeling party has come forward with the proposition that a lease or purchase from the Association be made of an eligible site and a new and up-to-date summer hotel be erected thereon. We also understand that some other West Virginians are getting interested in the project. Judging from the large number of people that could not be accommodated at the Mt. Lake Hotel this season, the time is at hand either for the enlargement and modernization of the Mt. Lake Hotel or the erection of a new hotel. Rooms with private bath have long been needed, and the planning of the golf links for 1911 emphasizes that need.

The Park is by no means deserted by our summer resident, but many are still lingering with us, enjoying the delightful fall weather.

Mr. Newman Wilson has purchase Mr. R. T. Miller's interest in the firm of Miller & Wilson, and will hereafter conduct the business alone in the old stand—Felty building.

Work is being pushed in straightening the course of the stream running through the Park front. One dam is about completed and the other will be put in before cold weather.

Mr. H. N. Cuppett and family are on their usual fall vacation visiting their many relatives and friends in Maryland and West Virginia.

Rev. P. Z. Musgrave left for Clarksburg Tuesday afternoon to attend the sessions of the annual conference. He will have the pleasure of reporting all claims met in full. He was requested by a unanimous vote of the official board to return for another year. Bros. T. H. Cuppett, E. E. Friend and A. W. Miller expect to attend the conference.

Mr. Harmison is improving Romney cottage and the family will remain in the Park all winter.

Messrs. Lee N. Hayden and George Dawson have accepted positions in the painting department of the B. & O. railroad.

Mrs. Amanda Michaels and family are occupying Hotel Chautauqua for the winter.

Preaching in the M. E. church Sunday evening at 7.45 o'clock by Miss S. C. Harris.

Rev. H. E. Friend was here over Sunday, called here on account of the critical illness of his sister, Mrs. Martha Weimer.

Mr. Charles Weimer, of Keyser, W. Va., spent several days here at the bedside of his mother.

Mrs. Lee N. Hayden is visiting her parents in Westernport, Md.

The Allegany House was put up at auction last week and bid in by the First National Bank of Oakland at $2500.

New Bank at Grantsville.

A new bank will be started in Grantsville about October 1, to be called the First State Bank of Grantsville, with a capital stock of $25,000, which was somewhat over subscribed. Some of the subscriptions had to be reduced. Mr. John O. Getty, son of Senator W. R. Getty and former cashier of the First National Bank of Grantsville, is at its head. He has had considerable experience in banking and is capable of making it a success. It is said that the quaint Amish people in the neighborhood are taking an interest as well as stock in it. They are quite numerous and prosperous in that part of Garrett and Somerset counties. This makes two banks for Grantsville and six for Garrett county.

SAW MILL BURNED NEAR GRANTSVILLE

Total Destruction of Property Belonging to King Bros.

Sunday morning at at early hour the saw mill owned and operated by King Bros., near Grantsville, was totally destroyed by fire of an unknown origin. The mill was located near the farm of Mr. Gideon J. Gnagey. There was no insurance and the loss, amounting to several thousand dollars, will have to be borne by the owners of the mill.

Prices in the Long Ago.

We are indebted to Isaac McCord Brandon, of Topeka, Kan., for some illuminating data on wages and the cost of living in this vicinity eighty years ago. Mr. Brandon was born and reared on a farm in Huntington township, Adams county, not far from York Springs. The figures he gives are from the daybook of his grandfather, Templeton Brandon.

They show that in the year 1830 Mr. Brandon was paying mason's assistants forty cents a day. The same wages were paid for threshing rye with a flail and for sowing plaster and husking corn. Wood choppers received thirty cents a day.

One chapter of the old ledger shows that a tenant who received forty cents a day for marking out corn furnished his sons at six and a quarter cents a day to drop the grain and his wife at twelve and a half cents a day to cover it with a hoe. These wages did not include board.

The entries show the following prices of commodities: Wheat, $1 a bushel; corn, 60 cents a bushel; oats, 31 cents a bushel; hay, $11 a ton; rye, 50 cents a bushel; potatoes, 50 cents a bushel; beef, 5 cents a pound; butter, 12 1-2 cents a pound; pork (side meat), 7 cents a pound; flour, $5.50 a barrel.

With the exception of beef, pork and butter, all of these items are almost identically the same in that locality today as they were eighty years ago.

But how different the wages! Where can you hire an able-bodied man now in the United States of Amerida for forty cents a day, or a woman field hand for twelve and a half cents a day, or a boy for six and a quarter cents a day.

This old daybook shows that Templeton Brandon paid his "hired girls" seventy-five cents a week, and they were the aristocrats of labor—the high-salaried specialists, who were so proud of their sinecures, which merely called for two or three bakings a week (sixteen loaves at a baking), churning (forty to fifty pounds), washing and ironing, milking five cows twice a day, etc., that they lorded it over the humble tenant's wife, and clung to their jobs until they married into homes of their own.

As we look over these fading statistic and memoranda, we unconsciously give voice to the question: If the past was glorious, where is the commercial injustice of the present?—Hagerstown Mail.

THE PEOPLE'S FORUM.

(Writers for the People's Forum are requested to make their communications as brief as possible. What Does the Manual Training Teacher Receive?

To the Editor of The Republican:

As a taxpayer and citizen I hope you can induce the President of the School Board to make public what is being paid for manual training at Oakland this year.

This is along the line of the request of your Deer Park correspondent two weeks ago, and I can assure you it is of vital interest to all parts of the county.

Yours truly,
Accident, Sept. 26th. CITIZEN.

State Sunday School Convention.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The Maryland State Sunday School Convention will be held in Baltimore, October 20th-21st at Harlem Park M. E. church, Gilmor street and Harlem Park. A strong team of specialists has been secured to assist in making the convention the best yet, such as Bishop Dubs, of Harrisburg, Pa.; Mrs. J. Woodbridge Barnes, of Newark, N. J.; Dr. Franklin McElfresh, of Chicago, and Dr. Richard Morse Hodge, of Columbia University, New York, together with a host of successful Sunday School workers of Maryland.

The program will be arranged to cover all the practical and evangelist methods now in use in scores of Sunday Schools that are winning, using and keeping the children and young people in the pale of the church. Every Sunday school in the State is urged to send its pastor, superintendent, two delegates and as many others as can possibly come.

Board and lodging will be obtained at very reasonable rates for those who may desire such accommodations. Write to Mr. Robt. L. Hoopper, 121 W. Saratoga St., Baltimore, who will cheerfully help you. We hope that every pastor and superintendent will announce the convention frequently to their congregations and Sunday schools, and insist on every one attending.

We also ask that all pray most fervently that the convention may be one of great spiritual power.

Very cordially yours,
CHARLES W. DORSEY, Pres.,
B. W. KINDLEY, Sec'y.

The Passion Players at Oberammergau

The Scene on Calvary

ALMOST fascinating place is Ober-Ammergau. One calls it a village because it is impossible to think of it as a town, in spite of its 1,650 inhabitants. It seems to be built anyhow. The houses are white, with deep-browed red roofs. Many of them are gaily painted, not only as to their woodwork and with quaint devices around the windows and doors, but with pictures, sacred and profane, and one of them has the whole of its wall space decorated in this way with frescoes done a hundred years ago by a great master in the art. The tortuous streets are full of little shops and some big ones, in most of which carvings are displayed for sale, and in this festival year there are temporary booths besides, for the sale of post cards or other things that the modern traveler has need of. The rocky mountains, clothed with dark pines and still in part snow-covered, rise on either side, and on the summit of the highest peak is an enormous wooden cross so far above you that it looks as if it were made of matchwood.

As you walk about the streets and the country roads almost every one you meet hails you with a "Gruss Gott!" and the men and boys raise their green, feather hats. They are the most courteous and gentle-mannered people I have ever met, and I think the most truly religious. You soon get used to the long hair of the men, even when you see it on the road sweepers. The true Ober-Ammergauer never cuts his hair.

Players In Daily Life.

It is worth while staying in Ober-Ammergau for a day or two before or after a performance, if only to see the players going about their daily work. You recognize a girl who serves you in a shop—a smiling German Fraulein with her fair hair neatly plaited—as one of the sweet singers in the choir of "Guardian Angels," when she wore a robe of gold and purple over her white, girdled garment, and her hair fell from beneath her crown to below her waist. An urchin paddling in the mud outside the schoolhouse stood with arms outstretched for full two minutes in one of the tableaux and never stirred. At the blacksmith's forge a man with a noble, classical face and gray hair and beard is shoeing a horse. Yesterday he was for the third time leader of the chorus, a kingly figure in gold crown and scarlet robe, with a fine voice and a splendid dignity of bearing. Everywhere you meet familiar faces, for during the long hours of the performance they have stamped themselves in your memory.

I was taken to the house of Johann Zwink, and we were shown into a brightly-painted room with an old porcelain stove in the corner. A sweet-faced young girl talked with us for a little and then said she would go and fetch her father. She was Ottilie Zwink, who takes the part of Mary, the Mother of Jesus. She is not yet twenty, but she is already spoken of as one of the best representatives of her difficult part that the play has ever had. She is the Mater Dolorosa, her voice full of piercing sorrow and her eyes of tears.

Presently her father came in, a gray-haired man with a kindly, somewhat pathetic face. He is a house painter, and he apologizes for the state of his working clothes. He has gone through many troubles, and only recently lost his eldest son, who had been a hopeless invalid for ten years. He had been Isaac in the tableaux of 1900, and it is said that he contracted the rheumatic fever from which he died by sleeping on damp hay, when all the beds in his father's house were given up to the visitors.

A Wonderful Performance.

As a young man, Johann Zwink twice played the part of the Apostle John. This year, for the third time, he is taking the part of Judas. His is a wonderful performance. He comes in first with the other disciples who surround their master in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. You would hardly notice him. He is one of the group. But in the house of Simon, when the Magdalene anoints the head and feet of Christ, he begins to make his mark. He stares in a puzzled, startled way at the waste, and grumbles at it. But there is no wickedness apparent in him yet. He is the treasurer of the little society, anxious for the morrow.

When he next appears, on the road to Jerusalem, he seems a little detached from the rest; his faith in the future is weakened. "But, Master," he says, "if thou art really about to leave us, make some provision for us. See here, there is not enough for one day more;" and when he is left alone he makes up his mind to withdraw, tired of hoping for glories to come. The dispossessed traders come upon him in this mood and persuade him to tell where his master is to be found, and so reap the reward offered by the Sanhedrin. "That is no betrayal," he says to himself, when they have left him.

Then we see him at the last supper, sitting wrapped in his suspicious thoughts, his back half-turned to the rest. Unwillingly, almost snatching at them, he receives the bread and the wine, and then the sop, after which he goes out quickly. When he appears before the Sanhedrin to claim his reward the good Nicodemus rebukes him with hot indignation. He stands trembling, but the silver pieces brought in tempt him again, and he tests them in a greedy, miserly way. His traitor's kiss, when standing on tiptoe, his whole attitude tense and fearful, he reaches over Christ's shoulder and greets him with his "Hail, Master!" is one of the thrilling moments of the play, and can never be forgotten. Afterward we see him stricken with horror on being told that the master he has betrayed is to die, his quick remorse, his throwing down the bag of money before the priests and rabbis, his lonely bitterness of despair, and the dreadful scene of his preparing to hang himself in a lonely wood.

It was difficult to believe that this gentle sad-faced man, sitting by the stove in his splashed clothes, was the man who had been the living, breathing object of the whole world's execration the day before. We asked him if it had saddened him to have to step from the part of the beloved disciple to that of the traitor. "Oh, we must," he said quietly. "We must take the parts that are given to us." And he has thrown himself for more than twenty years into the part which as much as any brings out the meaning of this great religious play.

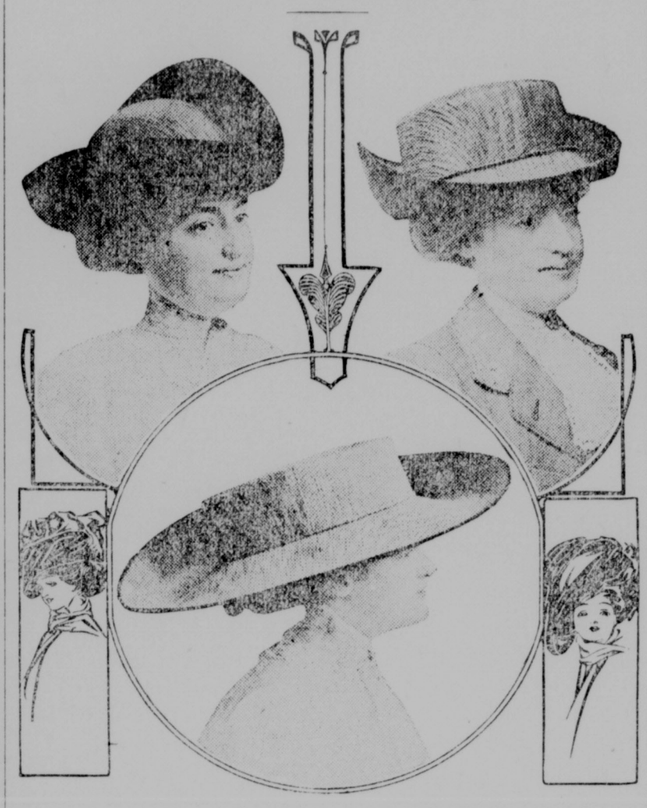
Lawyer's Brilliant Thought.

Luther B. Little, New York insurance magnate and ex-journalist, is responsible for the following story: What threatened to be a serious situation at an uptown club late yesterday afternoon was relieved by the ingenuity of a prominent New York lawyer, whose name cannot be given. When he was leaving his house yesterday at noon his wife informed him she was to give a 5 o'clock tea, and exacted a promise that he would assist in receiving the guests. The lawyer went to his club, where he drank numerous Scotch highballs. Suddenly he thought of the 5 o'clock tea. It was then 5:15, and an excuse came to him like an inspiration. Scrawling the following note he sent it by messenger: "Dear Fannie: I am sorry to disappoint you, but I have been taken unexpectedly drunk."

Home Millinery



THE untrimmed hats, turned out by manufacturers ready for the professional or amateur millinery, are so good in themselves, so graceful and becoming that they might be worn without the addition of ornament of any sort, and still be pleasing, although not complete. They are made of many varieties of silk, of velvet or plush, and in all sorts of combinations.

Those shown in the illustration are among the handsomest, made of silk crape in many rich colorings with high luster, and having the brims faced with velvet. Their shapes are all prepared for the addition of trimming, which this season will surely be of feathers. For some reason feathers have come to the fore like an avalanche. There are bands and pompons, quills, wreathes, breasts, sprays, wings and plumes. Perhaps the airships have called our attention to the feathered throng that sail about the sky, or perhaps chanticler has really awakened the world—to the possibilities of feathers. At any rate they are everywhere in endless and bewildering variety.

They have been made up in pieces all ready for the hat, and the way of the amateur milliner is made easy. This is the sort of trimming that is safe for her to undertake. She should buy both the shape and the trimming all ready prepared. Some of the former come already lined, which 's a great convenience; for placing the trimming properly is not easy by any means.

WEAK-ANKLED WOMAN'S SHOE

Dressy and High Footwear Now Being Made in a Variety of Styles.

It is an actual hardship to the woman whose ankles are so weak that she cannot wear low shoes or pumps in hot weather. Besides the discomfort from heat in our climate one is conscious of looking heavily shod.

Many are tempted for dress occasions to slip into dainty pumps, but for those women who have a wholesome dread of broken bones what is to be done?

Fortunately it is now possible to get "dressy" shoes high. To wear with lingerie frocks there are good looking shoes in white buckskin or suede, some of them embroidered or beaded on the vamp.

High bronze shoes or colored boots to match special frocks can also be had.

For morning or outing use there are well cut high tan shoes or sporting looking white canvas and buckskin with heavy soles. Tennis soles are also to be found on boots that support the ankle.

Reefer Coat Smart Wrap.

There is no smarter wrap for younger women's wear at seaside, lake or mountain than the reefer coat made from a light-weight woollen checked material. Now that the one-piece dresses are so much worn the short, loosely fitting little reefers are just the thing for warmth. A blonde wearing a reefer in a pale-blue and white check, trimmed with white pique collar and cuffs and gilt buttons over her frock of white pique looked charming, and I have in mind a handsome brunette in a pretty gray linen frock with a reefer of white and gray checked goods, the trimmings white suede and gilt buttons.

Smart-Looking Bonnet.

Elderly women who prefer bonnets to hats sometimes find it difficult to find pleasing models. At a store I saw recently some very pretty and smart-looking bonnets. One was of braided net, black, draped softly over the crown, and coronet trimmed with a bunch of dainty white flowers from which rose a black aigrette. The strings were of good ribbon. Another was of white Yedda braid, covered with cobwebby black net. The left side was trimmed with black silk roses and lilies of the valley. Black roses also held the strings at the back.

BRAIDED COSTUME.

Braiding seems to have lost none of its popularity, and some stunning costumes are elaborately trimmed in this manner. The cut today suggests a dressy afternoon costume in pale gray satin messaline, the bodice and tunic covered with self-tone silk rat-tail braid in close design. The front and neck of bodice is cream lace and tucked mousseline, the former edged with a narrow band of black velvet ribbon and tiny black buttons. The tunic opening on left side is trimmed at bottom with a huge fringed cabochon of gray braid. The long trained skirt is finished at bottom with three deep tucks.

Hotel Dinner Frocks.

Black and white make the best combination for the dinner frock at the hotel when on tour. Black taffeta and charmeuse or some of the silk and wool mixtures made in one-piece style with gulmp and undersleeves of net or lace give admirable service, and such a frock is smart enough for any ordinary occasion. Black and white admit of the introduction of a color note if such be desired.

Utilizing Old Buckles.

Old-fashioned oblong buckles are now utilized in a variety of ways by fashionable dressmakers in connection with the new effects in drapery. Large and small buckles are employed in this way and tiny gold buttons also enter into many of the dressmaking schemes for the coming season.

The Colors in the Rainbow.

A learned German scientist, in the course of an exhaustive study of the evolution of the sense of color, discovered that the rainbow has not looked the same to men in all ages. He found that it was at first thought to be all of one color. To Homer, he says, the rainbow seemed purple white. At a later period Xenophon saw in it "a purple cloud, red and yellow green." Two centuries after this Aristotle distinguished three colors—red, green and blue—and was able sometimes to see yellow between the red and green. Three hundrd years after Aristotle came Ovid, to whom the rainbow was "a thousand dazzling colors, which the eye cannot distinguish separately." But the tricolor division persisted until the thirteenth century.

TINY BABY'S PITIFUL CASE

"Our baby when two months old was suffering with terrible eczema from head to foot, all over her body. The baby looked just like a skinned rabbit. We were unable to put clothes on her. At first it seemed to be a few mattered pimples. They would break the skin and peel off leaving the underneath skin red as though it were scalds. Then a few more pimples would appear and spread all over the body, leaving the baby all raw without skin from head to foot. On top of her head there appeared a heavy scab a quarter of an inch thick. It was awful to see so small a baby look as she did. Imagine! The doctor was afraid to put his hands to the child. We tried several doctors' remedies but all failed.

"Then we decided to try Cuticura. By using the Cuticura Ointment we softened the scab and it came off. Under this, where the real matter was, by washing with the Cuticura Soap and applying the Cuticura Ointment, a new skin soon appeared. We also gave baby four drops of the Cuticura Resolvent three times daily. After three days you could see the baby gaining a little skin which would peel off and heal underneath. Now the baby is four months old. She is a fine picture of a fat little baby and all is well. We only used one cake of Cuticura Soap, two boxes of Cuticura Ointment and one bottle of Cuticura Resolvent. If people would know what Cuticura is there would be few suffering with eczema. Mrs. Joseph Kossmann, 7 St. John's Place, Ridgewood Heights, N. Y., Apr. 30 and May 4, '09."

Outlining Treatment.

"I want you to take care of my practise while I am away."

"But, doctor, I have just graduated. Have had little experience."

"You don't need it with my fashionable patients. Find out what they have been eating and stop it. Find out where they have been summering and send 'em somewhere else."

Resinol Is Appreciated and Highly Recommended by Intelligent People in All Parts of the World.

I highly recommend Resinol Ointment to all persons who are troubled with skin eruptions of any kind. I have found these preparations most useful and efficacious in many cases.

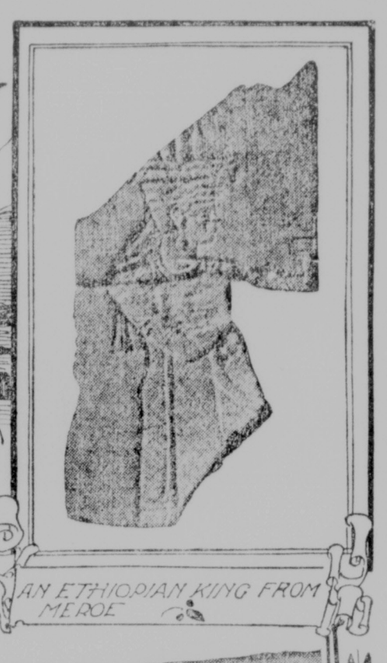
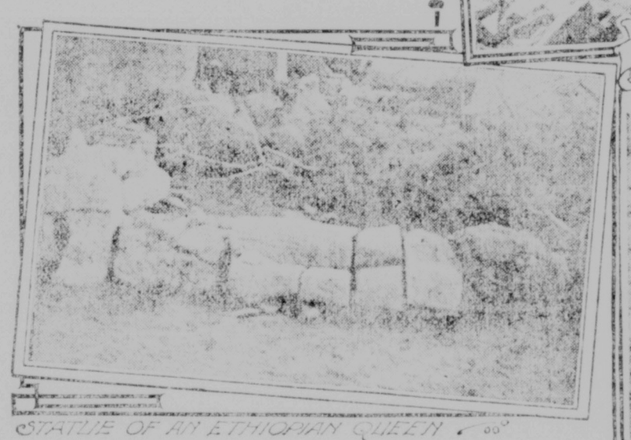
VERTICAL SUN-DIAL, AND MODEL OF A TEMPLE PYLON



AN ETHIOPIAN KING FROM MEROE

THE SUN TEMPLE, WHICH HERODOTUS DESCRIBES AS "THE TABLE OF THE SUN."



STATUE OF AN ETHIOPIAN QUEEN

EXCAVATION OF THE HIGH ALTAR AND HALL OF COLUMNS IN THE TEMPLE OF AMON.

VOTIVE ALTAR FOUND AT MEROE.

SINCE the excavation in Crete, which changed the Minoan myths into historical fact and revealed the existence of a great island empire that existed in the Aegean long before Greek civilization began, there have been few discoveries of greater interest and importance than those which have recently been made by Professor Garstang at Meroe, in the Sudan.

Professor Sayce in 1909 located the site of the city of Meroe on the east bank of the Nile, between the Fifth and Sixth Cataracts, and the excavations carried on by Professor Garstang at the end of 1909 enabled the details of the Ethiopian capital to become known. The Temple of Amon, where the Ethiopian Kings were crowned, was also discovered. Even more interesting is the excavation of the beautiful Sun Temple, which was discovered at the edge of the khor, or meadow, thus confirming the account of Herodotus, who tells us that Cambyses sent to the Ethiopian King to inquire about "the Table of the Sun" in a meadow "in the suburbs of the capital, where cooked meats were set each night." There is no doubt that this building is referred to in the Homeric legend that Zeus and the other gods feasted every year for twelve days among the blameless Ethiopians. Many others buildings were also explored, and the Temples of the Lion and the Kensa were discovered. It may be noted that the lion emblem was of frequent occurrence, and may probably have been the totem of the district. Many beautiful objects were dug up by the expedition, including forty inscriptions in the hieroglyphics of Meroe, two royal statues, and a great many vases of a new kind of pottery, objects of wood and glass, tiles and pottery. Especially interesting was the pottery which is almost as thin as biscuit china, and gives evidence of Roman influence. Professor Sayce found Greek inscriptions showing how the city was destroyed at the end of the fourth century A. D., by a King of Axum, since which event the city was uncovered.

Ethiopia was the name given by the Greeks to a country south of Egypt variously conceived as including only Nubia (Aethiopia Aegypti), or Nubia, Sennar, Kordofan and Abyssinia, or a region extending indefinitely east and west from the Upper Nile, but applied after the fall of Meroe more particularly to Abyssinia. The name is said to have had its origin from the fact that it was alluded to by the Greeks as a country of sunburned faces.

Historically there were three distinct kingdoms known as Ethiopia, those of Napata, Meroe and Askum. There is no definite evidence that either of these included at any time all the territory between the southern border of Egypt and Bab el Mandeb.

Already in the time of the old empire the Egyptians had relations with their southern neighbors. From the forests of Nubia they obtained a large proportion of their timber, and the city of Abu (Elephantine) derived its name from the ivory which found its way to this place from the interior of Africa. King Uncas (c. 3250-3260 B. C.) employed warriors belonging to six Nubian tribes in his war upon the Bedouins. The early pictorial representations of Nubian archers do not suggest that they were negroes. A regular conquest of the country south of Syene apparently was not undertaken until the twelfth dynasty (c. 2522-2323). The most powerful Nubian people at this time was Kash or Kosh, the Hebrew Cush. It is probable that the stock was originally Hamitic, though in course of time it absorbed various Negritic tribes. Usertesen III (c. 2409-2372) established his frontier north of the second cataract and built for its protection two forts at Semneh and Kummeh on opposite sides of the river. Whether the Hyksos kings ever held possession of this territory is doubtful. At any rate it had to be reorganized by Aahmes (1575-1553), the founder of the eighteenth dynasty and his successors. Napata probably had been the capital of the independent kingdom, since it was made the residence of the viceroy, entitled prince of Kosh, who governed the new Egyptian province. In the time of Rameses II there was an unsuccessful rebellion. Pianchi I, who seems to have reigned in Napata since 777, availed himself of the weakness of Egypt at the end of the reign of Usarken III to make an invasion of Egypt. He defeated twenty petty rulers and forced a treaty. Shabaka, a grandson of Pianchi, united all Egypt with Ethiopia under one crown. Napata was destroyed by Cambyses in 524.

A new kingdom gradually arose in the south after the fall of Napata, with Meroe as its capital. The kings, Arara, Harsiotef, Nastasen, who reigned in the fifth and fourth centuries, conquered considerable territory south of Meroe in Sennar and Kordofan, and possibly in Abyssinia. While the suzerainty of the Ptolemies seems to have been recognized for religious reasons, King Ergamenes, by putting to death the priests who had demanded that he should abdicate in the time of Ptolemy IV Philopator (221-204), paved the way for independence. Ptolemy V. Epiphanes (204-181) was able to resist his attack upon Egypt, but not able to prevent his asserting of sovereignty in Ethiopia. Queen Candace seems to have extended her power in the north, and twenty-five provinces are said to have been tributary to her. But her invasion of Egypt was successfully resisted by Caius Petronius in B. C. 24. Napata, that had been rebuilt, was destroyed by the Romans. Another Queen Candace is mentioned in Acts viii. But gradually Meroe itself fell into ruins. To guard against invasion by the Blemmyans, a people akin to the Bugaitae, the modern Beja, Diocletian moved the Nobatae, negro tribes of the same stock as the population of Kordofan, from the oasis of Khargeh into the Nile valley.

The mountain region of Abyssinia was probably inhabited in very early times by Semites as well as Hamites. Whether the original home of the former was in Africa or in Arabia the overflow population would naturally set in the direction of this Alpine country. As the native name shows, the Semitic Ethiopians were still in the nomadic state when they entered this territory, priding themselves on being wanderers, roaming freely wherever they liked. There were evidently successive waves of immigration. If the Egyptian Hbst is of Semitic origin, as can scarcely be doubted, they were apparently kinsmen of the Yemenites in Eretria and on the Somali coast c. 1500 B. C. Sebaean inscriptions found in Yeha, the ancient Awa, may be as old as the seventh century B. C.

As long as the Ptolemies dominate the Erythrean coast from Adulis, Berenice and Arsinoe, a strong Abyssinian kingdom could not well develop. But in the reign of Augustus, when the Romans suffered serious reverses in Arabia, and were occupied in Africa with Queen Candace, while the Arsacid conquests in eastern Arabia forced the Yemenite States to seek compensation for their losses elswhere, the Semitic element in Ethiopia seems to have been reinforced, and the kingdom of Askum founded. The "Periplus maris Erythraei," probably written by Basiles between A. D. 56 and 67, refers to a king of Askum by the name of Zoscales, who controlled the coast from Massowah to Bab el Mandeb, and was a friend of Greek culture. It is possible that some of the Greek coins with Greek legends that have been preserved should be assigned to the second and third centuries A. D.

On a marble throne in Adulis, Cosmos Indicopleustes found and copied in the sixth century an inscription commemorating the power of a great king whose name is not given. He is supposed by some scholars to be the founder of the Askumite kingdom, but it is more probable that he reigned at the end of the third century A. D. King Aizana is known to have reigned in the year A. D. 356. In his time Frumentius preached Christianity in the country. The political relations that had long existed between Askum and Rome were such as to favor his mission. In 378 Askum was reduced to its African territory. In A. D. 525 Elesbaas, king of Askum, with the aid of the Sabaen and Hadramautian rulers, made an end to the Himyarite kingdom of Dhu Nuwas, and Ethiopia again controlled Arabian territory. Before the end of the century, however, the Askumites were driven back to Africa, and never again extended their conquests to Arabia. According to a letter addressed to a king of Nubia in the time of the Patriarch Philotheus of Alexandria (980-1002), preserved in the fourteenth century "Life of the Patriarchs" and in the "Ethiopic Synaxar," a woman who reigned over the Beni el Hamuna had recently invaded the country, burned the churches and monasteries, and driven him from place to place. Marianus Victor speaks of this woman as the founder of the Zague dynasty, and as having married a ruler of the province of Bugna, a name afterwards corrupted into Beni el Zague. Eleven kings of the so-called Zague dynasty reigned until 1270.

The earliest monuments of Semitic speech in Ethiopia are the inscriptions found at Yeha. These are written in the consonantal Sabaen script and indicate that the writers used the lesna Geez, the language of Semitic Ethiopia as early as the seventh century B. C. Geez is today represented by two dialects, Tigre and Tigraï or Tigrina. The latter is spoken in Tigre, and the former is spoken in the districts north and northwest of Tigre, and shows great similarity to the old Geez.

Ways of Berlin Women

"I believe that the typical German hausfrau is a myth," said a New York woman who returned the other day from a year's residence in Germany. "I don't see how the average German woman finds any time to be a hausfrau. I sometimes wondered when the German woman found time to do anything at home.

"I spent eight months in Berlin with my daughter, who was studying music. From eleven to twelve in the morning the cafes were packed with German women, who go out to take their second breakfast in the public restaurants, a thing unknown in America.

"They take along their sewing or embroidery and sit an hour or two over their cup of coffee or glass of beer. At the concerts, too, they take their work and spend hours day after day listening to the music. You can spend an afternoon listening to beautiful music, a magnificent orchestra with fine vocal artists, for 16 cents. That is an illustration of some of the things that help to exile Americans.

"At three in the afternoon again you will see the cafe crowded with German women taking their afternoon tea. I think American women are more domestic than German, because I never heard of American women who left their homes in the evening to pass the time at the club. A German friend took me one evening to the German women's club. The club has a magnificent suite of apartments, including auditorium, reading room, parlor, cafe and smoking room.

"When she took me into the last apartment it almost feazed me for a minute. It was blue with smoke. I had never before seen a room filled with elegantly gowned, cultivated women all smoking. These were the wealthy society women of Berlin, titled some of them.

"They were cosmopolitan in their dress and manners and did not present any striking points of difference from the American women except in the smoking. It made the occurrence of last summer, when our immigration officials detained a second class passenger, a woman art dealer, for inquiry into her sanity because she smoked cigarettes, appear very funny in retrospect.

"The German women's clubs, like those of the Englishwomen, are based on the same principle as men's clubs; these are places for social enjoyment and for the convenience of members in taking meals, entertaining friends and so on. They do not take up work in study, philanthropy, reform and so on, like the women's clubs in America."

AFTER DOCTORS FAILED

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Cured Her

Knoxville, Iowa. — "I suffered with pains low down in my right side for a year or more and was so weak and nervous that I could not do my work. I wrote to Mrs. Pinkham and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Liver Pills, and am glad to say that your medicines and kind letters of directions have done more for me than anything else and I had the best physicians here. I can do my work and rest well at night. I believe there is nothing like the Pinkham remedies." — Mrs. Clara Franks, R. F. D., No. 3, Knoxville, Iowa.

The success of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, is unparalleled. It may be used with perfect confidence by women who suffer from displacements, inflammation, ulceration, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, bearing-down feeling, flatulency, indigestion, dizziness, or nervous prostration.

For thirty years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills, and suffering women owe it to themselves to at least give this medicine a trial. Proof is abundant that it has cured thousands of others, and why should it not cure you?

If you want special advice write Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for it. It is free and always helpful.

"The Wish Is Father to the Thought."

Dr. Robert L. Waggoner, the president of Baldwin university, said, in the course of an address on pedagogy at Berea, O.:

"And one of the most remarkable changes in the last 30 years of teaching is the abolition of corporal punishment. A boy of this generation is never whipped. But a boy of the last generation—well!"

Doctor Waggoner smiled.

"The boys of the last generation," he said, "must have believed that their instructors all had for motto:

"'The swish is father to the taught.'"

English in London.

Senator Depew, on the deck of the Lusitania, talked about "English as she is spoken in London."

"It is very difficult to understand that London English," he said. "I know a man who had lodgings all July in Bloomsbury, near the British museum.

"On his return from the museum one afternoon, my friend said to his landlady:

"'Can I have a cup of tea, if you please?'

"'Certainly, sir; at once,' the landlady replied. 'The kettle 'as been bi'lin' for 'ours.'

"'But—er—I prefer freshly boiled water, if you don't mind,' stammered my friend.

"The landlady reddened with anger.

"'Look 'ere,' she said, 'if I 'ad meant wot you mean I'd 'ave said h-ours.'"

THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

Our guns are muffled today as far as the school question is concerned awaiting the action of the State authorities following the visit here last week of State Superintendent Stephens.

We have nothing to retract or to modify of what we said heretofore, and we wish to assert most emphatically that we stand by every proposition in our editorial of Sept. 15th.

We understand that the high school has already enrolled eighty names, which assures the county of the State appropriation so far as that point is concerned. We learn also that several scholars have withdrawn on account of dissatisfaction in the arrangements and more are likely to do so soon and a goodly number who should be in school will not enroll at all.

Instead of attaining an enrollment of one hundred and proving a credit to the town and county and an honor to the school authorities we fear that the enthusiasm and interest are both stifled and that instead of the tendency of the high school being onward and upward it is on the retrograde.

We make no pretense of knowing how to "run the schools," but we do keep our ear to the ground and can detect what public sentiment demands. We are willing to be guided largely by the wishes of the vast majority of the citizens. Lincoln said, "you can fool some of the people all the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all the time."

We are not a candidate for the position of "running the schools." We will leave that to the brainy editor of the Mountain Democrat and the erudite County Superintendent until both are removed by the authority which placed them in the positions they have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the public generally they are unqualified to fill.

OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN.

With the formal opening of the Montgomery county campaign in the Sixth district Saturday, the Republicans disclosed the stirring spirit that is abroad. Mr. B. H. Warner, Jr., the nominee, has started to make an able canvass of the district. He possesses the qualities of a successful vote-getter. The meeting at Rockville stirred up the voters in a district that has suffered unfortunate divisions, but where the Republicans are prepared to show, as they usually do, their ability to lay aside differences in their endeavor to bring success to the party. The situation is ripe for the Democrats of the state to be given a severe pummeling. They are aiming to divert attention from their misdeeds and from their utter lack of ability that would appeal to the voter. The Sixth district owes it to the people of Maryland to show that it can and will center about the candidate of the party—that it can and will carry him to success.

It is hoped that this district will ring with the conquering slogan of Republican efficiency, that it will set forth the misdeeds of the Democracy, that it will bring home to the voter the irresponsibility of the the Democratic party and its leadership. The field for argument is altogether upon one side. The Democrats are aware that they have nothing to gain in a fight upon the basis of their own record and will do their uttermost to entrap the Republicans into forgetfulness of their delinquencies. This will not be done, and despite the fact that the issues of the administration and its achievements will be urged with all effect, there will be no let up on the domestic phase of the campaign. The Sixth district will not trail its colors. The field is open and the voters will rally, forgetting all differences and uniting beneath the standard of Mr. Warner. At it, and altogether at it, the Republicans of the Sixth will make as creditable a showing as they have ever made in the past. That means a great deal. This Western Maryland district carries with it the honor of the party and it must be valiant and earnest; it must be loyal and agressive; it must be soundly Republican, enthusiastically devoted to the policies of the party. The Rockville note will be heard all over the district, and it is believed that it will be a keynote worthy of rallying the voters to one of the most earnest and successful campaigns ever had in the Sixth district.—Cumberland News.

LEST YOU FORGET.

Speaking of free trade and low tariff, if our Democratic friends should succeed in carrying out their ideas what do you think would become of the vast army of mechanics and laborers that is employed in our factories? Didn't they, the Democrats, immediately after the adoption of the McKinley tariff, raise a howl about the high prices which they alleged had been brought about by it? And don't you remember that in 1892 the people elected Grover Cleveland, president, because they believed the pretty story told by our Democratic friends how they, the Democrats, were going to make everything so cheap that no man need want for anything, &c? You remember all that, don't you?

You also remember the result, too, don't you? You remember that a Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, was made chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and that the so-called Wilson Bill was finally adopted. Don't you remember our factories were all closed and the farmers were called upon to help feed the poor people who had organized themselves into an army and were roaming over the country begging for food? Have you forgotten about the soup houses that were opened in all the large cities for the purpose of feeding the poor men out of work? Have you forgotten that corn went down to $1.25 per barrel, wheat to 46 cents a bushel and some other farm products could hardly be given away?

Have you forgotten how Mr. McKinley, when he was the candidate of the Republican party for President, announced from the stump that we had better get our factories re-opened and see the smoke curl up from a thousand chimneys than to adopt a silver standard of money at a ratio of 16 to 1, as advocated by the Democrats? Have you forgotten how, after the election of Mr. McKinley and the adoption of the Dingley tariff, and the repeal of the Democratic Wilson law, the factories and mines resumed operations and all idle men went back to work and a shout for joy went up from the depending women and children of the land?

Have you forgotten how the prices of farm produce rose step by step until the present era of prosperity dawned upon the farmers? Have you forgotten that during the operation of the Democratic Wilson tariff that farmers in Garrett county were being sold out by the wholesale and that many farmers voluntarily quit because of the condition of the country? Have you forgotten that since the restoration of the Republican party to power the banks in Garrett county have increased in number until now there are six with a total deposit of $1,779,809.15?

In 1892 the Democratic party told you what it would do if it were put in power, and you know the result. In 1896, Mr. Bryan, then the candidate of the Democratic party, told you what the Democratic party would do if it were put in power. You also know the result of that election and what has been the condition of the country ever since. The Democratic party is again asking to be entrusted with power. Can you trust it? Would you take back into your employ a man who had wrecked your business and driven you into bankruptcy?

THE COLONEL'S ADVICE.

Colonel Roosevelt, who is regarded by some of his followers as the leading progressive of the country, gives the recalcitrants wholesome advice when he urges all Republicans whether progressives or regulars to support the candidates chosen in the primary. He urges hearty, not lukewarm support. That should put a quietus on the progressives who propose to run as independents. They should follow their leader. Citizens have a right to be independent of parties if they so elect, but when they classify themselves under that head, they should keep out of other party primaries.

The state of Washington has nominated progressives for United States Senator and congressmen and Colonel Roosevelt calls upon the regulars to give them loyal support. No doubt the regulars will give that kind of support and it is the bounden duty of progressives to reciprocate where regulars have been successful in the primaries. The primaries is the place to settle the question of who shall be the party candidate and all who participate in a free and fair party primary contest should abide by the decision of the majority. Colonel Roosevelt gives his followers good advice very frequently.

A Good Position

Can be had by ambitious young men and ladies in the field of "Wireless" or Railway telegraphy. Since the 8-hour law became effective, and since the Wireless companies are establishing stations throughout the county there is a great shortage of telegraphers. Positions pay beginners from $70 to $90 per month, with good chance of advancement. The National Telegraph Institute operates six official institutes in America, under supervision of R. R. and Wireless officials and places all graduates into positions. It will pay you to write them for full details at Cincinnati, O., or Philadelphia, Pa.

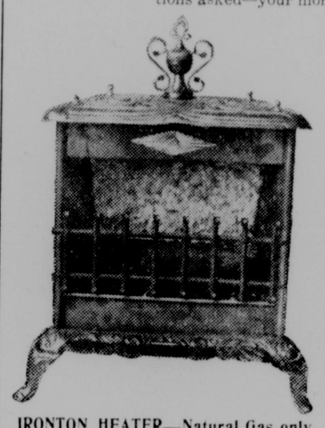
THE MONEY BACK STOVE

SOLD ON 10 DAYS' GUARANTEE.

If not satisfactory your money will be refunded by your dealer. No questions asked—your money back—that's all.



IRONTON HEATER—Natural Gas only

No. 2. Width 20 in. Depth 10 in. Height 34 in. Price $10.00

One of the neatest stoves made for living rooms, dining rooms, parlors, fine offices, etc. Front of stove 20 in., back 14½ in.; by this construction the stove is given a wonderful heating force with half the gas taken for the ordinary stove. Will comfortably heat the largest rooms in zero weather.

Body made of Wood's planished iron, lined with polished copper, fancy carved cast iron top, base, foot rail and feet. All cast parts highly polished and finished in oxidized copper, nickeled name plate, ornament and urn. Exposed parts protected with heavy asbestos board to prevent tarnishing from the effects of the heat. Guards 50 cents extra.

EVERY IRONTON HEATER is sold with the positive guarantee that if it does not do the work required of it after ten days' trial, it may be returned, and all the money paid for it will be refunded. No chances taken when you buy the Ironton Heater.

THE IRONTON HEATERS pay for themselves. In combination with the powerful Bunsen burner flame and the correct interior construction of our stoves, a great volume of cold air is taken from the floor through the flame, heated to a high temperature and with our patent baffle and reflection plates the heated air thrown out and down to the floor where needed. In a remarkably short time all the cold air in the room is circulated through the stove and the room is warm. THE IRONTON heats a room quicker and with less gas than any stove on the market.

THE IRONTON HEATS THE FLOOR. By the new and scientific construction of the stove the intense heat rays from the Bunsen flame and the highly heated cold air from the floor is thrown back to the floor and far out into the room, immediately displacing the cold air on the floor, making the Ironton the most effective foot warmer ever devised.

THE IRONTON WILL VENTILATE THE ROOM. If the Ironton is connected with a draft it will as effectually ventilate a room as the old coal grate, without impairing its heating force, in fact if a moderate draft is given the stove the heat thrown out is increased, because more cold air is circulated through the stove.

VENT PIPE TO THE IRONTON. We recommend vent pipes be connected to all gas stoves, but if you need heat in a room which has no flue connection buy the Ironton. It will give you a dry, clean heat, free from gas odor.

The Ironton Heaters give as good results without flue connection as any stove made. Try one of these wonderful heaters for ten days, if then you don't think it the best and most economical heater you ever saw, return it to your dealer.

IRONTON HEATER—Natural Gas only

Four Sizes; Prices, $4.50 to $7.50.

Body made of Wood's planished iron, polished copper linings, nickeled knobs, ornamented feet. Exposed parts protected with asbestos board. Guards extra, 50 cents.

OCTOBER WEATHER

Forecast as Given by Prognosticator Peter R. Smith.

The month will be attended by a number of showers of rain and sleet storms, which will be much more intense in northern sections than elsewhere. Much cloudy weather will prevail through the month in all sections. Storms of wind will show up at a number of places. However the action of the wind will be more intense on the northern lakes and their coasts than in interior parts. The counter storms from the northwest that are likely to sweep over the lakes and the northern Atlantic ocean will be more severe and boisterous than the usual October storms in the above parts, which is denoted by the presence of elements which intensify storm action. Cyclonic action will most likely prevail in some sections of the south. Thunder will also be a feature of the disturbance within the month. Frost will show up all through October, which may start in between the 4th and 5th.

A high temperature will prevail about the 2nd and 3rd, when the process of cloud formation will prevail in all western sections, which will be on transit, passing eastward on the 3rd, 4th and 5th, which may be prolonged. Showers of rain, wind and thunder will prevail during their passage, which is likely to be spasmodic with cold autumnal winds between the rain sections. A change to much cooler weather will follow the passage of the storm.

The 9th, 10th and 11th will bring on a reation of storms. Threatening conditions with autumnal storms in the northwest and over the lake regions will show up, with a change to much cooler and frost.

From the 15th to the 20th is likely to be a showery period, with gales of wind, which are likely to be intense over the lakes and in the northern sections. Rain, thunder and wind will be general over all sections, which will end in snow in the north and northwest.

From the 20th to the close of the month the storms will reach their climax. What the period from the 20th to the end of October promises to bring is much threatening weather, some days of sunshine, and also much cloudiness; wind, rain and electrical storms will prevail over central parts and in the north the storms will be intensified in respect to gales of wind.

WANTED—COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE requires the services of a representative in Oakland to look after subscription renewals and to extend circulation by special methods which have proved unusually successful. Salary and commission. Previous experience desirable but not essential. Whole time or spare time. Address, with references, H. C. Campbell, Cosmopolitan Magazine, 1789 Broadway, New York City.

Mr. B. H. Warner, Republican candidate for Congress, accompanied by State Senator Zillman, of Allegany county, and Mr. George W. Legge, Jr., a member of the Oakland bar, left here Monday afternoon on the campaign tour through the northern end of the county in the interest of Mr. Warner's candidacy. The first meeting was held at Accident where a splendid audience greeted the speakers Monday night. Tuesday night they were at Grantsville where they were warmly welcomed by an enthusiastic crowd of Republican voters. Yesterday afternoon the meeting at Bittinger was well attended and last night at Jennings a rousing reception was tendered the candidate and his associate speakers. Tonight the meetings will close with speaking at Friendsville, the Kitzmiller meeting for tomorrow night having been cancelled on account of the previous engagement of the public hall there for a local affair. Mr. Warner will return to Oakland tomorrow morning and will leave here for Cumberland, going on Saturday to Hancock, Md., to attend an agricultural exhibit and fair.

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. The servants desert. Gertrude and Halsey arrive with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. Gertrude revealed that she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room shortly before the murder. Detective Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped. Gertrude was suspected because of an injured foot. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey were called away by a telegram. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, told Halsey that while she still loved him, she was to marry another. It developed that Dr. Walker was the man. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Recovering consciousness, she said something had brushed by her on the stairway and she fainted. Bailey is suspected of Armstrong's murder. After "seeing a ghost," Thomas, the lodgekeeper, was found dead with a slip in his pocket bearing the name of "Lucien Wallace." Dr. Walker asked Miss Innes to vacate in favor of Mrs. Armstrong. She refused. A note from Bailey to Gertrude arranging a meeting at night was found.

CHAPTER XXI—Continued.

"Grossmutter," he said. And I saw Mr. Jamieson's eyebrows go up.

"German," he commented. "Well, young man, you don't seem to know much about yourself."

"I've tried it all the week," Mrs. Tate broke in. "The boys knows a word or two of German, but he doesn't know where he lived, or anything about himself."

Mr. Jamieson wrote something on a card and gave it to her.

"Mrs. Tate," he said, "I want you to do something. Here is some money for the telephone call. The instant the boy's mother appears here, call up that number and ask for the person whose name is there. You can run across to the drug store on an errand and do it quietly. Just say, 'The lady has come.'"

"'The lady has come,'" repeated Mrs. Tate. "Very well, sir, and I hope it will be soon. The milk bill alone is almost double what it was."

"How much is the child's board?" I asked.

"Three dollars a week, including his washing."

"Very well," I said. "Now, Mrs. Tate, I am going to pay last week's board and a week in advance. If the mother comes she is to know nothing of this visit—absolutely not a word, and, in return for your silence, you may use this money for—something for your own children."

Her tired, faded face lighted up, and I saw her glance at the little Tates' small feet. Shoes, I divined—the feet of the genteel poor being almost as expensive as their stomachs.

As we went back Mr. Jamieson made only one remark; I think he was laboring under the weight of a great disappointment.

"Is King's a children's outfitting place?" he asked.

"Not especially. It is a general department store."

He was silent after that, but he went to the telephone as soon as we got home, and called up King & Co. in the city.

After a time he got the general manager, and they talked for some time. When Mr. Jamieson hung up the receiver he turned to me.

"The plot thickens," he said with his ready smile. "There are four women named Wallace at King's, none of them married, and none over 20. I think I shall go up to the city to-night. I want to go to the Children's hospital. But before I go, Miss Innes, I wish you would be more frank with me than you have been yet. I want you to show me the revolver you picked up in the tulip bed."

So he had known all along!

"It was a revolver, Mr. Jamieson," I admitted, cornered at last, "but I cannot show it to you. It is not in my possession."

CHAPTER XXII.

A Ladder Out of Place.

At dinner Mr. Jamieson suggested sending a man out in his place for a couple of days, but Halsey was certain there would be nothing more, and felt that he and Alex could manage the situation. The detective went back to town early in the evening, and by nine o'clock Halsey, who had been playing golf—as a man does anything to take his mind away from trouble—was sleeping soundly on the big leather davenport in the living room.

I sat and knitted, pretending not to notice when Gertrude got up and wandered out into the starlight. As soon as I was satisfied that she had gone, however, I went out cautiously. I had no intention of eaves-dropping, but I wanted to be certain that it was Jack Bailey she was meeting. Too many things had occurred in which Gertrude was, or appeared to be, involved, to allow anything to be left in question.

I went slowly across the lawn, skirted the hedge to a break not far from the lodge, and found myself on the open road. Perhaps 100 feet to the left the path led across the valley to the Country club, and only a little way off was the foot-bridge over Casanova creek. But just as I was about to turn down the path I heard steps coming toward me, and I shrank into the bushes. It was Gertrude, going back quickly toward the house.

I was surprised. I waited until she had had time to get almost to the house before I started. And then I stepped back again into the shadows. The reason why Gertrude had not kept her tryst was evident. Leaning on the parapet of the bridge in the moonlight, and smoking a pipe, was Alex, the gardener. I could have throttled Liddy for her carelessness in reading the torn note where he could hear. And I could cheerfully have choked Alex to death for his audacity.

But there was no help for it; I turned and followed Gertrude slowly back to the house.

The frequent invasions of the house had effectually prevented any relaxation after dusk. We had redoubled our vigilance as to bolts and window-locks, but, as Mr. Jamieson had suggested, we allowed the door at the east entry to remain as before, locked by the Yale lock only. To provide only one possible entrance for the invader, and to keep a constant guard in the dark at the foot of the circular staircase, seemed to be the only method.

In the absence of the detective, Alex and Halsey arranged to change off, Halsey to be on duty from ten to two, and Alex from two until six. Each man was armed, and, as an additional precaution, the one off duty slept in a room near the head of the circular staircase and kept his door open, to be ready for emergency.

These arrangements were carefully kept from the servants, who were only commencing to sleep at night, and who retired, one and all, with barred doors and lamps that burned full until morning.

The house was quiet again Wednesday night. It was almost a week since Louise had encountered some one on the stairs, and it was four days since the discovery of the hole in the trunk-room wall. Arnold Armstrong and his father rested side by side in the Casanova churchyard, and at the Zion African church, on the hill, a new mound marked the last resting-place of poor Thomas.

Louise was with her mother in town, and, beyond a polite note of thanks to me, we had heard nothing from her. Dr. Walker had taken up his practice again, and we saw him now and then flying along the road, always at top speed. The murder of Arnold Armstrong was still unavenged, and I remained firm in the position I had taken—to stay at Sunnyside until the thing was at least partly cleared.

And yet, for all its quiet, it was on Wednesday night that perhaps the boldest attempt was made to enter the house. On Thursday afternoon the laundress sent word she would like to speak to me, and I saw her in my private sitting room, a small room beyond the dressing room.

Mary Anne was embarrassed. She had rolled down her sleeves and tried a white apron around her waist, and she stood making folds in it with fingers that were red and shiny from her soap-suds.

"Well, Mary," I said encouragingly, "what's the matter? Don't dare to tell me the soap is out."

"No, ma'am, Miss Innes." She had a nervous habit of looking first at my one eye and then at the other, her own optics shifting ceaselessly, right eye, left eye, right eye, until I found myself doing the same thing. "No, ma'am. I was askin' did you want the ladder left up the clothes chute?"

"The what?" I screeched, and was sorry the next minute. Seeing her suspicions were verified, Mary Anne had gone white, and stood with her eyes shifting more wildly than ever.

"There's a ladder up the clothes chute, Miss Innes," she said. "It's up that tight I can't move it, and I didn't like to ask for help until I spoke to you."

It was useless to dissemble; Mary Anne knew now as well as I did that the ladder had no business to be there. I did the best I could, however. I put her on the defensive at once.

"Then you didn't lock the laundry last night?"

"I locked it tight, and put the key in the kitchen on its nail."

"Very well, then you forgot a window."

Mary Anne hesitated.

"Yes'm," she said at last. "I thought I locked them all, but there was one open this morning."

I went out of the room and down the hall, followed by Mary Anne. The door into the clothes chute was securely bolted, and when I opened it I saw the evidence of the woman's story. A pruning ladder had been brought from where it had lain against the stable and now stood upright in the clothes shaft, its end resting against the wall between the first and second floors.

I turned to Mary.

"This is due to your carelessness," I said. "If we had all been murdered in our beds it would have been your fault." She shivered. "Now, not a word of this through the house, and send Alex to me."

The effect on Alex was to make him apoplectic with rage, and with it all I fancied there was an element of satisfaction. As I look back, so many things are plain to me that I wonder I could not see at the time. It is all known now, and yet the whole thing was so remarkable that perhaps my stupidity was excusable.

Alex leaned down the chute and examined the ladder carefully.

"It is caught," he said with a grim smile. "The fools, to have left a warning like that! The only trouble is, Miss Innes, they won't be apt to come back for a while."

"I shouldn't regard that in the light of a calamity," I replied.

Until late that evening Halsey and Alex worked at the chute. They forced down the ladder at last, and put a new bolt on the door. As for myself, I sat and wondered if I had a deadly enemy, intent on my destruction.

I was growing more and more nervous. Liddy had given up all pretense at bravery, and slept regularly in my dressing room on the couch, with a prayer-book and a game knife from the kitchen under her pillow, thus preparing for both the natural and the supernatural. That was the way things stood that Thursday night, when I myself took a hand in the struggle.

CHAPTER XXIII.

While the Stables Burned.

About nine o'clock that night Liddy came into the living room and reported that one of the housemaids declared she had seen two men slip around the corner of the stable. Gertrude had been sitting staring in front of her, jumping at every sound. Now she turned on Liddy pettishly.

"I declare, Liddy," she said, "you are a bundle of nerves. What if Eliza did see some men around the stable? it may have been Warner and Alex."

"Warner is in the kitchen, miss," Liddy said with dignity. "And if you had come through what I have, you would be a bundle of nerves, too. Miss Rachel, I'd be thankful if you'd give me my month's wages to-morrow. I'll be going to my sister's."

"Very well," I said, to her evident

Mary Anne Had Gone White

amazement. "I will make out the check. Warner can take you down to the noon train."

Liddy's face was really funny.

"You'll have a nice time at your sister's," I went on. "Five children, hasn't she?"

"That's it," Liddy said, suddenly bursting into tears. "Send me away, after all these years, and your new shawl only half done, and nobody knowin' how to fix the water for your bath."

"It's time I learned to prepare my own bath." I was knitting complacently. But Gertrude got up and put her arms around Liddy's shaking shoulders.

"You are two big babies," she said soothingly. "Neither one of you could get along for an hour without the other. So stop quarreling and be good. Liddy, go right up and lay out aunty's night things. She is going to bed early."

After Liddy had gone I began to think about the men at the stable, and I grew more and more anxious. Halsey was aimlessly knocking the billiard balls around in the billiard room, and I called to him.

"Halsey," I said when he sauntered in, "is there a policeman in Casanova?"

"Constable," he said laconically. "veteran of the war, one arm; in office to conciliate the G. A. R. element. Why?"

"Because I am uneasy tonight." And I told him what Liddy had said. "Is there any one you can think of who could be relied on to watch the outside of the house to-night?"

"We might get Sam Bohannon from the club," he said thoughtfully. "It wouldn't be a bad scheme. He's a smart darky, and with his mouth shut and his shirt-front covered, you couldn't see him a yard off in the dark."

Halsey conferred with Alex, and the result, in an hour, was Sam. His instructions were simple. There had been numerous attempts to break into the house; it was the intention, not to drive intruders away, but to capture them. If Sam saw anything suspicious outside, he was to tap at the east entry, where Alex and Halsey were to alternate in keeping watch through the night.

As before, Halsey watched the east entry from ten until two. He had an eye to comfort, and he kept vigil in a heavy oak chair, very large and deep. We went upstairs rather early, and through the open door Gertrude and I kept up a running fire of conversation. Liddy was brushing my hair, and Gertrude was doing her own, with a long free sweep of her strong, round arms.

"Did you know Mrs. Armstrong and Louise are in the village?" she called.

"No," I replied, startled. "How did you hear it?"

"I met the oldest Stewart girl today, the doctor's daughter, and she told me they had not gone back to town after the funeral. They went directly to that little yellow house next to Dr. Walker's, and are apparently settled there. They took the house furnished for the summer."

"Why, it's a bandbox," I said. "I can't imagine Fanny Armstrong in such a place."

"It's true, nevertheless. Ella Stewart says Mrs. Armstrong has aged terribly, and looks as if she is hardly able to walk."

I lay and thought over some of these things until midnight. The electric lights went out then, fading slowly until there was only a red-hot loop to be seen in the bulbs, and then even that died away and we were embarked on the darkness of another night.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Condemns Sunshine Fad.

A well-known medical man condemns emphatically the form of vanity that leads people on their holidays to do their utmost to get sunburned. "Workers in city offices," he says, "who go into the country or to the seashore for only one or two weeks will deliberately sit about hatless in the blazing sun, so that they may come back looking brown and healthy. As often as not this practice will send them home far less fit for work than they were when the y started, for even if one escapes sunstroke the effects of the sun's rays upon the uncovered head are very bad. They will cause dizziness, headache, nausea and loss of appetite and will often upset the digestive system for many days. There are ways of avoiding the more serious effects of the sun, but personally I would advise the city dweller who must have a brown face to stain it with walnut juice and wear a broad-brimmed hat like a sane and sensible individual."

Making Him Go.

"I don't think I shall go to the poker party to-night."

"That's one of the truest thinks you have done for quite awhile."

"Jinx owes me $5 which he was to pay me at the party to-night, and which I had decided to give to you to go shopping with, but I am really too tired to go out; guess I'll let it go this time."

"That is just like you! If it was anything you wanted to do you would go in a minute, but when it is something for your wife you are too tired! You will go to that poker party to-night or you will hear from me!"

CHURCHES AND THE SALOON

Decrease in Number of Ohio Dram Shops Followed by Increase in Church Members.

An analysis of the Presbyterian [illegible] of Ohio in local option districts, by Rev. Frederick N. McMillan, chairman of the committee on evangelical work of the synod of [illegible] shows a suggestive increase during the past two years in the number of communicants, says United Presbyterian. From this report it appears that the decrease in the number of saloons is followed by a notable increase in the membership of the churches. The reasons assigned are that when men are drinking they have no money to sufficiently clothe their wives and children that they may attend church with any degree of self-respect. The families of drinking men are discouraged and lack heart to appear in places of religious concourse. Mr. McMillan says: "Religion and whisky will not mix. Drinking men keep women and children away from church through shame, fear, poverty and want of heart. Many a woman says: 'I haven't the heart to go to church when my husband is drinking; he doesn't want us to go to church, and I will not go because my children and myself cannot dress as well as others.'"

This want of heart is one of the most depressing conditions that can befall any one. The sense of disgrace, on account of being the companion of a drunkard, has kept many a wife shut up in her solitary home, nursing the vultures that are eating out her very heart. The consolations of the gospel would give her hope, but oh, the humility of it; the human nature of it! The dread of appearing where her very presence would be an advertisement of her own humiliation no doubt accounts for many sorrowful wives failing to identify themselves with any church.

It requires no argument to show that the average drinking man will not go to church. He takes no interest in such things. His companions are not there. There is little in common between him and those who worship God. He is at the extreme antipodes of society. His moral sense is benumbed, and the whole association of the saloon is to deepen and intensify opposition to religion and purity of life. When God plants a church the devil comes to plant a saloon nearby, if he can. He must hold his own converts, if he can. He must win over some of the church members, if he can. He must lay his fiery skewers to burn the feet of the children, if he can.

The way to destroy the influence of the devil over the lives of men and women, is to destroy the works of the devil. The saloon system is the great barrier between the drinker and the church. Its destruction means saner moments for the drinker, when he can think more of the things of the kingdom of God, and the things, too, that will promote the betterment of his home. It gives his family an opportunity to take heart, to regain hope, and to look upon life with some degree of joyfulness. There is no doubt but there would be a greater disposition on the part of the drinker's family, and the drinker himself, to attend the public worship of God if he spent his money at home and for his home. A reformed husband and father means sunshine to the home, and the grateful family will have an especial reason for expression of gratitude to God by a public profession of his name. Every argument that supports the saloon opposes the church.

Glasgow a Soberer City.

The Glasgow chief constable in a report issued recently comments upon the remarkable increase of sobriety in the city. Apprehensions for drunkenness totalled 14,167, a decrease of considerably over 4,000. While lack of money has no doubt contributed to increased sobriety, the chief constable states that the growth of temperance has been a great factor. A great deal of money has been spent on amusements, which was just as available for spending in drink. Compared with two years ago the apprehensions for drunkenness showed a decrease of nearly 7,000.

Blue Laws in Madrid.

The old "night life" of Spain, the music and dancing that has been such an attractive feature to American and other foreign travelers to Madrid and the southern cities of Seville, Cadiz, Ronda, Malaga and Barcelona, is a thing of the past. The government decided that night bohemianism was demoralizing the youth of the country, and King Alfonso issued a royal decree closing music halls, cafes, and other places of amusement at 12:30 a. m. Formerly these places never closed their doors.

This One Is On Me.

A man in a mellow condition went into a barber shop and seated himself in one of the chairs. "What's your pleasure, sir?" asked the polite barber. "O, er—give me a haircut—and have one yourself."—Everybody's.

Machines of Peril.

"Do you think airships could be used effectively in warfare?" "They might," replied the skeptical person, "if we could provide the airships and induce the enemy to go up in them."

INJURED IN WRECK.

Conductor Thrown Down 25 Foot Embankment.

George Hahn, C. & N. W. conductor, Arbor Ave., West Chicago, Ill., says: "I was thrown from a car down a 25-foot embankment and my kidneys were badly bruised. Kidney trouble developed and for a whole year, I was unable to work. I suffered agonizing pains in my back and the kidney secretions were in terrible condition. My vitality gradually diminished and the doctor's treatment failed to help. When in despair I began with Doan's Kidney Pills and soon improved. Continued use cured me and at present my health is excellent."

Unfair.

Senator John H. Bankhead, discussing a political move, said with a smile:

"Oh, it's too coldly calculated. It's almost unfair. In fact, it's like Mrs. Blank.

"Mrs. Blank is a leader of Bar Harbor society. Her husband said to her, one afternoon, as she made a very elaborate toilet for a garden party that she was giving to some members of the British legation:

"'Why did you write to all our guests that this party was to be absolutely informal?'

"Mrs. Blank laughed.

"'So as to be the best-dressed woman present, of course,' she said."

A Happy Husband.

"Our house used to smell soapy and steamy wash day," says a well-known man, "but since my wife began buying Easy Task laundry soap, there is no more of that. I've investigated that soap and find it is made of purest cocoanut oil, cleanest tallow, borax and naphtha, and that it not only cleans, but antiseptic ises clothes, cooking vessels and everything else washed with it. We tried it first by buying two cakes for ten cents, with the understanding that our money would be refunded if it didn't make good. Of course, it made good."

Not Impregnable.

Horace Avory, K. C., just appointed a judge, is one of the mordant wits of the British bar. One day, cross-examining a recalcitrant witness, he asked:

"What are you?"

"A retired gentleman," proudly asserted the ex-cheesemonger.

"Well," snarled Avery, "when you achieved the position of gentleman, why did you retire from it?"

Does Engineering Work.

Mlle. Bandurin is superintendent of an engineering firm in Russia. She was graduated from the Women's Technological Institute in St. Petersburg, and has had practical experience in engineering. She built a steel warehouse for an army co-operative society, has been assistant engineer in building a bridge across the Neva and has done other important work.

Remarkable Young Lady.

From a feuilleton: "Her voice was low and soft; but once again, as Janet Fenn withdrew from the room and closed the door after her, the fiendish gleam came into her odorless eyes."

"If we hear any more of Janet we will let you know."—Punch.

A Business Transaction.

"So Mr. Penniwise married his typist!" said Miss Cayenne.

"Yes."

PRESSED HARD.

Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

A superintendent of public schools in a Southern state says: "My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker, had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavor of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum. I was so pleased with it that, after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal; the whole family liked it so well that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but in a more marked degree in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

PROPER TREATMENT FOR OVERHEATED WORK HORSE

It Is Important to Know That Exhaustion From Summer Heat May Be Prevented—Clean Stable, Feed and Air Essential.

(By A. S. ALEXANDER, Wisconsin.)

When during the hot weather the hard worked horse suddenly stops sweating, lags, weakens, pants and has hot dry skin and extremely reddened membranes of the eyes, nose and mouth he is suffering from heat exhaustion and by using the thermometer it would be found that his temperature is over 106 degrees.

Unless a horse in this condition is immediately rested, put in a cool, shady, breezy place and there cooled off he will be likely to fall and die of heat apoplexy or "sun stroke."

It therefore is well to know and look out for the symptoms here outlined and then be able to treat them intelligently. In the first place it is important to remember that heat exhaustion may be largely prevented:

By keeping the horse's stable clean, airy, perfectly ventilated, darkened and screened in summer time.

Feeding the best of foods in adequate but not extreme quantities.

Making no sudden changes of food.

Allowing plenty of cool, pure drinking water.

Permitting ample time for rest at noon.

Removing the harness during such rest periods.

Not overworking any horse and always changing frequently the middle horse of a three horse team, as he suffers fearfully from the direct rays of the sun. Also shade the polls of horses at work and in such a way that air can pass under the shading hat or other cover.

When a horse shows symptoms of heat exhaustion stop work, stand him under a tree where there is a breeze, shower his body with cold water from a sprinkling can, keep cold wet packs to the poll of his head and give him large, frequent doses of stimulants such as whisky in strong cold coffee.

Do not bleed him or give him aconite or other poisonous drugs. Repeat the dose of stimulant every half hour at first and every hour or two as he gains strength and the fever abates.

A good stimulant is prepared by mixing together one part of aromatic spirits of ammonia and two parts each of alcohol and sweet spirits of nitre. Of this give two ounces in a pint of water or cold coffee as one dose.

If he is bloated give four ounces of hyposulphite of soda dissolved in water and inject soapy cold water and glycerine into the rectum once an hour until relieved. In case of sun stroke call in the graduate veterinarian as soon as possible.

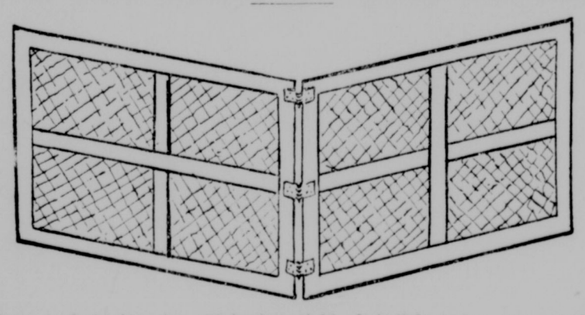
HINGED HURDLER FOR SWINE



Instead of chasing pigs and having them running in every direction, make a V-shaped hurdler as shown in the illustration, says Farm Press. The frame is light wood and the webbing is made by two thicknesses of close mesh wire fencing with water-proofed building paper between. A stiff wooden brace runs each way through the center so the fencing may be stretched tight. It is light and so strong that it is almost indestructible. With one of these rigs you can build a narrow lane on one side of the pen and move it ahead as the hog moves. He sees the opening ahead and walks that way to get out. Hogs may be coaxed with a rig of this kind when it is impossible to drive them where you want them to go.

EXTINCTION OF EARLY EQUINES

Much Mystery Surrounds Disappearance of American Horse—Attributed by Some to Increasing Cold

Over three centuries ago, at the time of the Spanish conquest, there was not to be found in the new world, so it has been practically proved, a single animal that answered to the description of the horse. Horses, indeed, which the Spanish brought with them, were objects at first of great terror to the natives, who took them to be four-legged supernatural beings come purposely to aid the conquerors. Yet recent research by the Whitney mission has established beyond doubt that long before Columbus the Americas were overrun by horses from the mountains of Alaska to the plains of Patagonia, says Harper's Weekly.

In 1826 the chance discovery in New Jersey of an equine fossil of an unknown kind, led to more methodical investigation of America, with the result that pre-historic horse bones have been found in California and Oregon; between the Gulf of Mexico and the Carolinas; in Texas, Florida and the valleys of Mexico; in the basin of the Mississippi and on the western slopes of the Rocky mountains. Horses, too, must have been numerous in this country previous to the appearance of man, researches having brought to light their fossilized remains mixed up with pottery and the stone arms of cave dwellers.

How is it, then, that the equine race, represented in America by kinds of fossils considerably more numerous than in Europe, came for a time to vanish from this country to reappear thousands of centuries later with the Spanish conquest? For but a century after Cortez there were already in existence herds of wild horses in the regions of the mata and the prairies of the far west.

By some this temporary extinction of the American horse has been attributed to the increasing cold and the encroachments of the glacial hemisphere. It is certain that the elephant and camel disappeared at the same time. Another explanation is that the horses succumbed to a malady such is the "rinderpest" in South Africa. Again, what brought about this exodus may possibly have been a species of the present-day Columbian vampire bat, which sucks the life blood of its victims, and in the districts it infests prevents the horse being used as a beast of burden.

The Christians' Rewards Here

PERHAPS the sweetest of earthly feelings is that of peace. No rebellion, no fierce longing for the unattainable, no clashing of one's own will against that of another—quiet, tranquillity, peace. The meek, we are told, shall have "abundance of peace," as the very crown of their great reward. And peace is always at the command of the follower of Christ.

Suppose that you possess a valuable property. You entrust it to one in whom you have absolute confidence. You have tried him again and again and he has never failed.

Around you may be panic and distress. Banks may be suspending payment. Commercial houses may be closing. What do you care? You are sorry for those who are losing, but you have no worry for yourself. You know that your all has been deposited in a perfectly safe place.

Such faith is seldom justified among men. Humanity at best is an imperfect thing. But we have one to whom we may entrust something far more precious than our silver and gold—ourselves, the essence of our souls. Knowing him in whom we have believed, we feel no fear of what man can do unto us. We may know perfect peace, if we are stayed on him.

The Highest Reward.

Thus the most beautiful of gifts is the Christian's reward.

The most necessary of helps to learn to write is a copy. By following the copy, you may become an expert penman.

The most necessary thing for the right shaping of life is an ideal. This the Christian has in his great leader.

Life is a struggle, a bitter war with Satan. In order to wage it successfully we must have armor. The Christian has the armor. He may gird his loins with truth; put on the breastplate of righteousness; have his feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the sword of the spirit, and no evil can possibly touch him.

The idol of all right modern socialism—all lofty philanthropy—is work. Give all men useful and congenial work to do—inspire in the hearts of men the love of work—and the greatest obstacle to the coming of the millennium has been removed.

The Christian has his work cut out for him, and if he is a true Christian he is eager to do it.

Faith, hope and love, the great trinity—these are the Christian's.

By Faith All Is Won.

Faith—the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen. By faith, we climb the steeps of being and bring the Lord Christ down to our human needs. By it we commit our way unto the Lord, rest in him and wait patiently for him. It is the hand by which we reach to God.

And hope, that anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast—how could we smile without it? The hope that we may retrieve the shattered fortune; that we may reclaim the wandering child; that we may some time meet those whom we have "loved and lost awhile," supports us through the sternest trials.

But the love, that is truly the greatest thing in the world, is pre-eminently the Christian's. As God's son, he looks up to his creator with filial affection. Toward his brethren he yearns with all the poignant desire of true fraternity. And as love begets love, so shall he receive in kind his reward, good measure, pressed down and running over.

Peace, a high ideal, armor for the great fight of life, a work to do and the will to do it, and a heart filled with faith, hope and charity—what more can a Christian desire?

Money cannot buy these great gifts; the Christian has them for the asking.—Christian World.

The Call to Service.

Every individual has certain endowments—some of them fixed in amount, some capable of almost unlimited extension—which are his to use for himself or for his master. Time, intellectual power, social gifts—some have one, some another, not many possess all. But upon every Christian comes the obligation to service, not by imperious command, but as the natural response of the heart to him through whom alone we have knowledge of the true meaning of life. The man who can truly speak of Christ as "my saviour" cannot call anything else selfishly "mine." As in feudal times, the man surrenders himself and all to his master and receives it again at his hands on conditions of stewardship and service. "We are not our own. We are bought with a price."

The Meaning of Prayer.

What is prayer? To connect every thought with the thought of God. To look on everything as his work and his appointment. To submit every thought, wish and resolve to him. To feel his presence so that it shall restrain us even in our wildest joy. That is prayer. Prayer is that communion of the mind with God through which our will becomes at last merged into his will. The highest prayer or communion with God is a life of love. —Frederick W. Robertson, D.D.

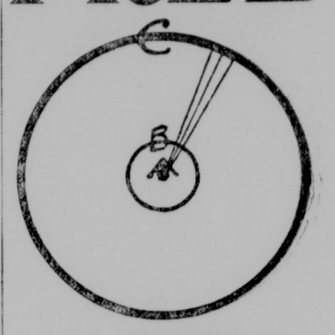
$350 Piano FREE



PUT SPOKES IN THE WHEEL

To the person who draws the greatest number of spokes with pen or pencil in the above wheel according to the instructions given below, we will give absolutely free, one A. B. SMITH PIANO in mahogany, worth $350, with stool and delivery. To all others who send in a reply to this contest, we will give a reduction order on our merchandise for $25 and a copy of up-to-date sheet music absolutely free. This is an excellent chance for YOU to secure a splendid piano without paying for the same in money. We ask you to pay for it with your skill in drawing.

DIRECTIONS

Take a drawing pen or sharp pointed pencil and start at the black dot in the center marked "A." Use a ruler and draw lines or spokes to the outer rim of the wheel or circumference marked "C." If any two spokes touch at the circle marked "B," then these two spokes will not be counted amongst the number you have drawn. Remember the spokes dare not touch at the inner circle marked "B." This is done to give absolute accuracy in finding who has drawn the greatest number of spokes. All our advertisements containing this wheel have the wheel made from exactly the same cut and there is not a variation of a thousandth of an inch.

WE ARE DETERMINED

to make this contest the fairest and squarest contest ever given. Remember that if you do not desire to send in a reply drawn on this advertisement you may use a separate sheet of paper, drawing your own wheel and filling in the spokes. It costs you nothing to make an effort to win this piano or to secure a copy of sheet music or a $25 order on our merchandise.

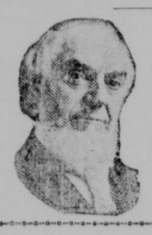
PEOPLE'S PULPIT...



Sermon by CHARLES T. RUSSELL, Pastor Brooklyn Tabernacle.

PREACHING TO IMPRISONED SPIRITS

"By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison" (I Peter iii, 19).

Knoxville, Tenn., Sept. 25.—A Convention of Bible Students is in session in this city. Pastor Russell of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, as President of the International Bible Students Association, addressed the Students twice today. His audiences were large and intelligent. We report one of his addresses from the text foregoing. He said:—

Much speculation has been aroused by our text. Some have claimed that it signifies that Christ, after his death on the cross and before his resurrection, went to some place where human spirits are imprisoned in some kind of purgatory and there preached to them. Not only is the Catholic theory in line with this suggestion, but many Protestants hold that the dead may be prayed for and thus be assisted to escape from eternal torment. All of this is wrong, as we shall show—quite contrary to the teachings of our text when viewed in the light of its context.

Those preached to were not human beings, but spirit beings—not men, but angels. This is clearly stated in verse 20, which tells us when these angels were imprisoned and why. They were imprisoned in the days of Noah at the time of the flood. They were imprisoned for disobedience. So we read (verse 19), "He preached unto spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing." Turning back to the Genesis account of that time we find quite a complete record or history of these disobedient spirits, in the Sixth Chapter, verses 1-5.

Angels Preferred to Be Humans.

Some time after father Adam's disobedience and his expulsion from Eden—the holy angels were permitted to visit humanity with a view to assisting men back to harmony with God. This doubtless was permitted for two reasons: First, had such an opportunity not been furnished, the angels might in the conclusion of God's great Plan, have been inclined to say, Yes, God accomplished human salvation, but in a very roundabout way and at very great cost and trouble. Had he given us an opportunity to mingle with humanity we might have had an uplifting influence upon the people and have accomplished their reconciliation to God.

God wished to forestall any such misunderstanding of the wisdom of the Plan which he had arranged and would, in due time, work out; secondly, the angels themselves never had come in contact with sin of any kind. Hence they never had been tested or tried in respect to their obedience and loyalty to the Creator. They were permitted to attempt the recovery of humanity—partly in order to test their own obedience and loyalty to God.

Our knowledge of spirit beings and the powers granted to them by the Almighty is limited to our observation of the Bible record. The angels who appeared as young men at our Lord's sepulchre and again at his ascension and who, as soon as they had accomplished the purposes of their visit, vanished, are illustrations.

We remember the account of how Abraham sat in the door of his tent and, Behold, three men came to him. He received them as men, entertained them at dinner and, we read, "They did eat and talked with Abraham." They had human powers though still spirit beings. When they dematerialized they vanished.

Genesis vi, 1-2, informs us that this privilege of materialization for the assistance of mankind was eventually misused by some of the angels as an opportunity for sinful intercourse with humanity. The time at which this began is not definitely stated. The expression, "When men began to multiply on the face of the earth," might safely be estimated at about a thousand years after Adam's creation and fall. This would leave a period of 655 years to the flood. It was approximately during that long period that the angelic sons of God, seeing the daughters of men, took to themselves for wives all that they chose of the fair daughters of men. And they bare children to them. The same became mighty men which were of old men of renown—and giants. We remember that at that early day human life was much longer than now and that manhood was scarcely reached before a century and that few became fathers sooner; and when we remember also that the children of the angels are not mentioned as boys, but men, mighty men, renowned men, it gives the thought that the angels, without Divine permission, had really started to propagate a new race and that their progeny was much stronger than that of the poor, Adamic stock.

The disregard of Divine Law meant that the strength of these giants would be used selfishly and the licentious example of the angels had a demoralizing effect upon the children of Adam, as well as upon their own children. All this is stated and implied in the words, "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." What a terrible picture of the condition of things before the flood! But God was not astonished, for he had foreknown everything. Hence he had a great canopy of water in the sky which temporarily gave the earth an equable, temperate climate, but which he intended should fall upon the earth and cause the great flood in Noah's day. Hence at the appropriate time God gave instructions to Noah to prepare an ark for the saving of himself and his house. Noah and his family were the only members of Adam's race in all the earth who were not more or less contaminated by those angels. How wide must have been that influence when we read as an exceptional matter, "Now Noah (and his family) was perfect in his generation"—the disobedient angels had nothing whatever to do with generating them.

Fallen Angels Changed.

While the angels preferred to live as men in human bodies, they would not be overwhelmed like humanity in the flood, but merely dissolve, by dematerialization, their human bodies and be, as originally, spirit beings. Satan was the first sinner against the Divine government, in his endeavor to set up a separate empire and to have humanity for his subjects. Although God had full power to destroy Satan and the other disobedient angels, he has not exercised that power. Instead he merely isolated them from himself and the holy angels and imprisoned them, in the sense that he no longer permitted them to materialize, either as a serpent or as humanity for the tempting and injury of our race. In this sense they are imprisoned—restrained of liberty.

Now let us hear St. Peter's words respecting these angels who sinned. He says (II Peter ii, 4), "God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment." The word tartarus here rendered "hell" in our Common Version, is found nowhere else in the Bible. It refers to our earth's atmosphere and to the fact that those fallen angels, called demons or devils, are "the power of the air." And Satan, who was originally an angel of much higher rank and nature, is their Prince, "The Prince of the power of the air," the Prince of demons. They are "cast down" in the sense of being treated ignominiously. They are "in chains of darkness," not in chains of iron. They can still go and come and be sources of temptation to humanity who are in a sinful attitude of mind. They are restrained in chains of darkness in the sense that whatever they do must be done in the dark—until their judgment time at the Great Day—at the beginning of Messiah's thousand-year day of the reign of righteousness.

Turn to St. Jude's Epistle. There we read (verse 6), "The angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in age lasting chains, under darkness, unto the Judgment of the Great Day." Their first estate in which they were created was the spirit or angelic condition. They left their own proper condition of living and nature, in violation of the Divine will, that they might live on a lower plane—live in sin; for the angels are sexless, though always referred to as masculine. And our Lord declares that those begotten of the holy Spirit, who during this age shall attain to the resurrection of the dead, the "First Resurrection," will be "like unto the angels" in several respects—one of these being that they will neither marry nor be given in marriage, but be without sexual distinction.

In harmony with this note how spiritualists hold their seances, either in absolute darkness or in a very faint light. They claim now that the spirits are getting more and more power of materialization and that soon they will be able to materialize in broad day light and go about amongst humanity as members of the race. We do not question the power of God to restrain these fallen angels, these demons—his power to restrain them from materializing and thus doing great harm in the world. Nevertheless, we wonder if they will not be permitted by God to find some greater powers of materialization, contrary to the Divine decree, that their course in this matter may more particularly manifest to what extent some of them have changed and reformed and desire to be obedient, for instance, while others are still as opposed to God and righteousness as ever. There is room for this understanding in the statement of the Apostle that the chains of darkness were to control them until the Great Day—not necessarily into that day—perhaps at its very beginning they may be permitted to gain certain liberties and do a certain amount of injury to humanity, to all who are not attentive to the Word of God, and who, therefore, will not know who these spirits are—that they are the fallen angels, the demons of the Bible.

"Wicked Spirits," "Lying Spirits."

These are the terms used in the Scriptures in describing the fallen angels, who from earliest days have attempted to deceive humanity—representing themselves as human beings who have died and who desire to communicate with their friends. And they attempt to do so through spirit mediums. This is their practice from of old. Their endeavor is to break down the human will and to more and more control it. The height of their ambition and success is to fully dominate the human will, so that they may use the human body as their own flesh, as when they had power to materialize. Those who come fully under their control become demented, often several spirits gaining possession of the one personality and attempting to use the same brains and body. It is estimated that one-half of all who are in insane asylums are merely victims of spirit-obsession. The great remedy against all this is the Truth of God's Word. Those who accept that cannot be deceived. But the masses of mankind are being deceived. The Scripture teaching is that when a man is dead he knows not anything, and will never know anything until the resurrection of the dead. Whoever knows this is fortified against all the deceptions of the evil spirits.

We are not claiming that all mediums are fraudulent. Some of them we know to be most sincere. A large number have been delivered from their awful position of acting as tools of Satan by the reading of our little pamphlet, "Proofs that Spiritism is Demonism."

Jesus Preached to These Spirits.

There are no human spirits to be preached to. Human beings are not spirit beings. The dead of humanity who have never heard of "the only name given under heaven or amongst men whereby we must be saved" will hear that name in God's due time—in the resurrection—during the thousand years of Messiah's reign when he, as the true Light, shall lighten every man that cometh into the world" (John i, 9).

But if Jesus died and in death knew not anything, how could he preach to the fallen angels? We answer that it is a common expression that "actions speak louder than words." The great actions or facts connected with our Lord's death and resurrection constituted a most wonderful sermon to the fallen angels. As they beheld the Redeemer's faithfulness to God, even unto death, even the death of the cross, and as they then beheld God's faithfulness to him in raising him from the dead to the highest nature—the divine nature—"far above angels and principalities and powers and every name that is named"—all this constituted a most wonderful sermon of love and loyalty, faith and obedience, etc. The sermon to them meant, How serious was our mistake in being disobedient to God in any particular. It meant also, May not God, who has thus gone to so much trouble for the redemption of fallen men, have in his heart also a place of mercy for us, should we repent? The Apostle intimates that these angels, with the exception of Satan, are yet to have a testing or trial, for he assures the Church that God purposes that we, as the Bride of Christ, shall not only be entrusted with the work of judging or giving trial to the world of mankind during the Millennium, but also that we shall judge angels—not the holy angels, for, of course, they need no judging on our part—but the fallen angels (I Cor. vi, 3).

Quite possibly the hopes inspired by that great sermon preached by our Lord's resurrection to the spirit beings led some of those fallen angels to repentance. If so we may suppose that during the eighteen centuries since, they have suffered severely at the hands of the rebellious angels, who would be aroused to animosity by their reform.

The Scriptures seem to imply that "fallen angels," "wicked spirits," "lying spirits," "demons," will have much to do with bringing about the great "time of trouble" with which this Gospel Age will end, before the complete inauguration of Messiah's Empire and the binding of Satan (Revelation xx, 4). The intimation is that the trouble here will be short and sharp, as in the days of Noah. The declaration of the Apostle that these evil spirits will be in chains of darkness until the Judgment of the Great Day leaves room for the inference that when the Judgment of the Great Day begins, the chains of darkness will be broken. If, therefore, we have the right understanding of this matter great events are near at hand. Spirit mediums are already declaring that the spirits tell them that they will soon be able to materialize in broad daylight. With the power to counterfeit and personate humanity what may this not mean in the way of deception mentioned by our Lord, who declares that it will be so strong that it would deceive even the "very elect" were they not specially protected and guided.

We remind you also of the great stride which Spiritism, Occultism and Psychic Science have made within the last few years. These now number amongst their friends and advocates some of the brightest scientific minds. One of these, Prof. James, of Harvard College, recently, before dying declared that he would speedily communicate with his friends. Already the newspapers tell us that he has begun to communicate, but the mediums claim that he has difficulty in operating through them, because of the great force and power of his intellect and that they must gradually become able to act as his mediums. From the Bible standpoint all this is a fraud—a deception—but not on the part of the mediums who are themselves deceived, but on the part of the fallen angels, who are thus tricking humanity.

FREIGHT WRECK AT SKIPNISH

Five Cars Derailed and Six Head of Cattle Killed.

Tuesday morning an eastbound freight train composed of live stock, sawed stone and merchandise was wrecked at Skipnish, caused by a broken wheel, and as a result five cars were derailed and badly broken up, the track put completely out of commission for more than six hours and six head of cattle killed outright. None of the trainmen were injured.

TRUSTEE'S SALE
OF
Valuable Coal
AND
OTHER PROPERTY
Situate in Garrett County, Md.,
Known as the Gillespie Property.

By virtue of the authority vested in the undersigned Trustee, by decree entered on the 20th day of May, 1910, in the matter of C. D. Gillespie, bankrupt, pending in the District Court of the United State for the Northern District of West Virginia, the undersigned Trustee will, on

SATURDAY,
the 23rd Day of July, 1910,

at Eleven O'clock A. M.,

at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, the following real estate, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, owned by C. D. Gillespie.

I

All the coal and the right to mine and remove the same, underlying

315 Acres of Land,

being part of a tract known as "Elk Garden," situate in Garrett county, Maryland, together with 100 acres of the surface of said 315 acres and all the rights and privileges granted to the said C. D. Gillespie in connection with said coal property. Two-thirds of said property was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Ada A. V. Halterman, by deed dated the 6th day of June, 1908, of record in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 43, folio 152, and the remaining one-third was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Austin Brown, Sheriff, by deed bearing date December 1, 1909, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 59, folio 433, to which deeds reference is now here had for a more particular description of said property.

This property is situated very near the Western Maryland Railroad, near the station of Henry on said railroad and adjacent to the coal property now being operated by the Davis Coal & Coke Company at its mines at Henry. The coal underlying this property which is to be sold is very valuable.

II

All of the coal underlying a tract of land containing

68 1-2 Acres,

situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being known as a part of the "Elk Garden" tract and being the same coal conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Peter F. Snyder and wife, by deed bearing date October 27, 1905, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 364, to which deed reference is here had for a particular description of said 68½ acres, together with all the rights and privileges as to mining rights, surface and rights of way, as were vested in said Gillespie by said deed.

This 68½ acres of coal is considered very valuable. It is located a distance of about three or four miles from the railroad.

III

An undivided one half interest in ten acres of land, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being also a part of what is known as the "Elk Garden" tract, said undivided one-half interest having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry F. Marshall and wife, by deed dated the 11th day of August 1902, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 42, folio 300, to which deed reference is had for a particular description of said property.

IV

A tract or parcel of land containing one acre, more or less, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Gorman, having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry C. Stempie and wife, by deed dated the 30th day of April, 1907, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 54, folio 454. There are situated, on this property, several buildings, one of which can be used for a combination dwelling house and store building.

All of the above described property will be sold free and acquit from all liens and incumbrances. The title to all of said property is considered good.

TERMS OF SALE.—One-third cash in hand on day of sale and the residue upon a credit of six and twelve months, the purchaser to give interest bearing notes, with good personal security, for the deferred purchase money and the legal title to the property to be retained as additional security, until said deferred purchase money has been paid.

C. W. MAXWELL, Trustee.

The above sale is continued until
Thursday, October 20th,
at 2 o'clock P. M., at the same place.

This property will positively be sold at the time and place mentioned.

ORDER NISI.

Fred. A. Thayer, Trustee, vs. Lewis A. Rudisill and Kate B. Rudisill.

No. 1694 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland.

Ordered, by the CircuitCourt for Garrett county, sitting as a court of equity, this 21st day of September, 1910, that the sale of the property mentioned in these proceedings made and reported by Fred. A Thayer, Trustee, under a power of sale contained in a deed of trust from the said Lewis A. Rudisill and Kate B. Rudisill, his wife, to the said Fred. A. Thayer, be ratified and confirmed, unless cause to the contrary thereof be shown on or before the 21st day of October, 1910; provided a copy of this order be published in some newspaper published in Garrett county, once a week for three successive weeks before the 14th day of October, 1910.

The report states the amount of sale to be $2500.00.

NO JURY NEEDED IN U. S. COURT

Garrett County Cases Were Dismissed.

Judge John C. Rose, of the United States District Court, Baltimore, opened court in Cumberland Tuesday morning with Arthur L. Spamer, of Baltimore, clerk; William J. Feaga, of Cumberland, deputy clerk, and Jacob D. George, of Cumberland, deputy United States marshal. It was the first jury term since the establishment of the court in Cumberland and the first term since the initial opening of the court by Judge Thomas J. Morris, but a jury was not needed, as the two jury cases from Garrett county, Clarence A. Knight against the Kendall Lumber et al, and Clarence A Knight against John R. Male et al were virtually dismissed in their present form because of the failure to file a resurvey of tracts involved in the suits. The plaintiff however, can bring new suits.

The cases involve the rights to certain lands occupied by the defendants, which it is claimed, were grants to Revolutionary soldiers and should now be the property of their descendants. The plaintiff seeks to get possession of these lands and oust the defendants. The Kendall Lumber Company is a very wealthy corporation, which conducts large lumbering operations in Garrett county. Thomas J. Peddicord, of Oakland, was the attorney for the plaintiff, and Richard T. Semmes, Cumberland, and Gilmor S. Hamill, Oakland, for the defendants.

The attorneys were accompanied to Cumberland by Messrs. R. T. Browning, William Browning, Freeman Lewis, Alexander C. Mason and Alpha Hinebaugh, witnesses.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The weather is delightful and many who usually go to their winter homes early in September are still with us.

The death of Mrs. Martha Weimer cast a gloom over the entire Park.

The Cowan cottage was sold last week by Mr. C. W. Hopkins to Mr. E. L. Davidson, of Parkersburg, W. Va.

Rev. P. Z. Musgrave was returned to us for another year, to the delight of the entire congregation.

Mr. Ray H. Gans and sister, of Point Marion, Pa., were visiting relatives in Oakland and Mt. Lake Park last week.

Mrs M. M. Schrock was surprised by the calling of a number of her lady friends Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock, the occasion being the anniversary of her birth. Those present were Mrs. P. Z. Musgrave, Mrs. Joseph Lee, Mrs. A. R. Sperry, Mrs. J. A. Hayden, Mrs. M. Echard, Mrs. Brison Welch, Mrs. E. E. Friend, Mrs. Eugene Wilson, Mrs. Upton Cuppett, Mrs. Joseph Callis, Mrs. Dellinger and Misses Anna DeBerry, Rose Wilson and Vernie Schrock. A splendid luncheon was served and a good time was had by all.

Mrs. J. G. Hayden and four little daughters, of Westernport, are at Haydenhurst for an indefinite visit.

Mrs. J. A. Enlow is visiting her sister, Mrs. Dean, in Ohio.

WILL SAIL ON SATURDAY.

Dr. John E. Legge Will Leave New York for Vienna That Day.

Dr. John E. Legge, of Oakland, left here Tuesday night for New York City from which port he will sail Saturday on the Lusiatania of the Cunar Line, for Trieste, Austria, his objective point, however, being Vienna, where he will take a six months' course in medicine and surgery in the world-renowned university of that city.

Before arriving at Trieste a cruise of eighteen days' duration will be made by the vessel which includes the Maderia Islands and Mediterranean points, touching at Algiers, Morocco, and other North African ports.

Dr. Legge will be accompanied on his journey by Dr. Harris, of Harrisonburg, Va., a class mate who studied with him in the Maryland University at Baltimore.

Dr. Legge has been fortunate in securing the services of Dr. N. I. Broadwater to look after his practice during his absence. Dr. Broadwater has had several years experience in the hospitals of Baltimore and for the past two years has been resideot surgeon at The University Hospital in that city. He will pursue the general practice of medicine and surgery, including refraction of eyes.

Married.

JEFFREY—GREEN—A very pretty wedding ceremony took place Thursday evening last at the home of the bride's parents, Rev. and Mrs. John T. Green, who reside about three miles from Lonaconing. The contracting parties were Mr. George F. S. Jeffrey, son of Mr. and Mrs. Dan Jeffrey, and Miss Meadie Green, whose parents are already mentioned. The bride's father performed the ceremony, witnessed by about fifty friends and relatives. The attendants were Mr. John Jeffrey, the groom's brother, and Miss Bertha Green, sister of the bride. An elegant supper was served the guests following the ceremony and congratulations. The newly married couple are both popular young people. The guests that were present are as follows: Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Green and family, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Jeffrey, Sr., and family, Mrs. S. W. Green, Mrs. James Weir, Sr., and family, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Jacobs and family, Mr. and Mrs. David McGee, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Weir and family, Mr. and Mrs. James Weir, Jr., and family, Mr. and Mrs. Alonzo Green and family, Mr. and Mrs. Chester Green and family, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Robeson, Miss Ethel Michaels, Mr. and Mrs. James Whitman and family, Mr. David Scollick.

Dr. R. B. Ward, of Cameron West Va., will not engage in active work this year and will remove from that place to Oakland within two weeks, and will occupy his residence on East Green street.

TELLS OF TRIP TO WARNER HOME.

Home of B. H. Warmer, Jr., Republican Candidate for Congress, at Kensington, Montgomery County, Maryland

The followiug communication appeared in the Hagerstown Morning Herald:

Hancock, Md., Sept. 29.

Editor Morning Herald:

A short while after the nomination of B. H. Warner, Jr., for Congress, I had the pleasure of visiting the hospitable home of Mr. Warner, at Kensington, Montgomery county.

The town of Kengington was founded in 1890 by B. H. Warner, Sr., who built in 1892 the house in which the family resides. Mr. Warner has five sons and four daughters, all in good health, and all at home, with the exception of one son, who is now U. S. Consul at Bahia, Brazil.

Kensington is one of the most attractive suburbs of the Capital, twelve miles distant, and most of its residents do business in that city, reaching it by way of the B. & O. R. R., trolley or automobile. It is a delightful place to live. The home of the candidate is in the center of the town, and is surrounded by a lawn of five acres.

Mr. B. H. Warner, Sr., has built or aided in building most of the houses, and erected the Presbyterian church—The Warner Memorial—in honor of his father, and, he also built and gave to the town a public library in honor of Crosby S. Noyes of the Evening Star.

B. H. Warner, Jr., has the same spirit of enterprise which has characterized the career of his father, and is especially fond of politics and governmental affairs, of which he has been a close student.

He was appointed U. S. Consul at Leipzig, by President McKinley in 1897, when but 22 years of age, and continued to fill the position until 1905 when he relinquished it and returned to this country to practice law. During his stay abroad he graduated at the University of Leipzig, and was honored by having conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In my opinion the Republican party has made no mistake in selecting Mr. Warner as its standard bearer, and few families have done as much in developing the interests of Maryland during the past 20 years, as the family of the candidate.

My advice to any one who has the opportunity to enjoy a visit to Mr. Warner to avail himself of the invitation, and they will come away convinced that he is a devoted Marylander, and a patriotic American. LEANDER H. KUHN.

BOY DIED OF HIS INJURIES

One of Fourteen Children and His Death was the First in Family.

Lewis Owens, aged nearly thirteen years, and employed in the Kendall woods near Breedlove, several miles south of Crellin, as a water carrier, was injured on last Friday morning by falling beneath the wheels of the locomotive drawing a log train, and as a result his death occurred Saturday at Crellin as he was being brought to Oakland where he was to have been placed in the Home Sanatorium for treatment.

The youth was one of fourteen children, his parents recently coming to this section of the country from Luzerne county, Pa., and his was the first death that has taken place in the family.

The boy's funeral occurred Sunday afternoon at Crellin, the services being conducted by Rev. E. Manges, pastor of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church of Oakland.

MRS. MARTHA ALICE WEIMER.

Died, at her home in Mountain Lake Park Friday, Sept. 30th, after several weeks illness, Mrs. Martha Alice Weimer, widow of Joseph Weimer, and mother of our fellow townsman, Mr. E. A. Weimer. The deceased lady was 66 years of age and was the daughter of Israel and Dorcas Friend, who resided during their lifetime near Cranesville W. Va. Mrs. Weimer's husband died twenty-six years ago, leaving his widow and five children, namely, E. A. of Oakland, Charles, of Keyser, W. Va., and Misses Lily, Cora and Josie of Mountain Lake Park. The deceased was a devout member of the M. E. church for many years—almost her entire life. An excellent neighbor and a true friend. Her funeral occurred Monday afternoon from her late home at Mountain Lake Park and the interment was made in the Oakland cemetery. Rev. P. Z. Musgrave, pastor of the Park M. E. church, conducted the funeral services.

SOLOMON HOGUE.

Solomon Hogue, an extremely old and highly respected resident of near Deer Park died Friday afternoon after a short illness. His funeral took place Sunday with interment at Deer Park.

Great Chief's Visit.

An official visit to Youghiogheny Tribe No. 151, Imp'd O. R. M. was made by the Great Sachem of Maryland, Charles W. Townsend, and Great Chief of Records, Dr. James C. Littleton. The great chiefs were glad to find the tribe in such good condition with prospects of a bright future, by many initiations of members added during the next quarter. The Tribe was greatly strengthened by this official visit. After spending three hours or more in the wigwam, with good speeches, etc., the council fire was quenched to meet again on the 8th Sun, Travelling Moon, G. S. D. 419, at the 8th Run. Fraternally in F. F. C.

HOME FOR DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT.

Methodists of Oakland District Purchased Mr. G. A. Fraley's Property.

Yesterday morning the committee representing the various congregations of the Methodist Episcopal church of the Oakland District, purchased from Mr. G. A. Fraley that gentleman's residence on Oak street, the price paid being $4500. District Superintendent Reed and family will occupy the property within the next two weeks.

Mr. Fraley and family, for the present at least, are undecided whether to rent another property or board. In the spring, however, he expects to erect a dwelling in Oakland.

FRIENDSVILLE.

Corn around here is in the shock, although up to this time no frost has been seen on the pumpkin.

Charles Taylor was a visitor last week at Meyersdale, Pa., where he took in the fair.

Edward Savage and wife have a bran new boarder at their house. He arrived early Sunday morning. Name him Warner, Ed.

George F. Frazee is still very ill, although we trust he may improve by the time this is in print.

The Crawford Hotel changed hand on Monday, the 3rd, F. G. Fox having purchased it from R. T. Frazee and will run it from the above date. The present lessee, Russel Friend, has retired. We have not heard if Mr. Friend intends to remain among us or not.

Milford Frazee and family spent Sunday at Cove visiting the former's mother and brothers.

The new pulpit chairs presented by the Dorcas Society to the Lutheran church are very fine ones.

Miss May Guard, who has been very ill with typhoid fever at Clarksburg, W. Va., is reported better. Mrs. Jasper Guard is attending her.

W. W. Savage is putting a cement walk around his store building near the bridge. This will greatly improve the property, also the town.

There are several cases of measles in town and vicinity at present.

John Shartzer, of Oakland, was a visitor to our city last week.

Henry L. Wolf and family entertained at an ice cream party the following guests: Mrs. Harry Rumbaugh, Misses Laura and Susan Rumbaugh, Foster Rumbaugh, J. T. Garey and wife.

Miss Mary Neil accompanied by her brother, August, spent a few days in Accident, returning Monday.

Leslie E. Friends's electrical plant is nearing completion. An expert is here putting in the machinery. The power will be water. Mr. Friend has constructed a power plant on the river which will give him from 80 to 100 horsepower or more. Who will be next to make use of this cheap power and there is plenty of it.

Salathiel Savage, accompanied by his wife, has been taking his vacation in Pennsylvania, West Virginia and other states. They returned home Tuesday.

Harry Custer, son of D. S. Custer, who will finish his education at a college near Baltimore, left on the noon train Friday.

Rev. Powers, of the M. E. church, is attending Conference.

A meeting of the owners of the coal land in this vicinity will be held in the Council Room on Tuesday evening. If things go in the right way the future of our town is assured.

How about that new road to Accident and to the State road. Things appear rather quiet. People of Friendsville and Accident don't let this business rest, keep hammering away and its bound to come. What a convenience it will be to the people of Accident and neighborhood alone, as well as Friendsville. Look what it would mean in a year in the saving of your horses and buggies, wagons, etc.

With the splendid power L. E. Friend will have for the light plant, what would be the matter with putting a reservoir on the hill and supplying the town with water.

The Republican meeting held in the Opera House Thursday evening was a very enthusiastic one. The house was packed and a large number of ladies were present. Speeches were made by G. W. Legge, Jr., Senator Zillman of Allegany county, and the candidate for Congress, B. H. Warner. What might have been a serious time was prevented by the prompt action of a few leading spirits and the playing of the band. It happened during the speech of Mr. Legge. The engine running the dynamo gave several short sharp toots, caused several to think there was a fire in town and a rush was made for the doors, and confusion reigned for a minute or two, when the band started up a spirited march which quieted the audience, although the lights going out made them play in the dark, which they did in good style. Lamps were brought in and Mr. Warner addressed the audience in a brilliant speech causing rounds of applause. The speech of Senator Zillman was also roundly applause, as was also Mr. Legge's.

REV. WILLIAM HENRY BATES, D. D.

Of Washington, D. C., Will Deliver Four Sermons in Oakland.

Dr. Bates will preach in the Garrett Memorial Presbyterian Church on Sabbath, October, 9th, at 11 o'clock a. m., and at 7.30 o'clock p. m.; also on Sabbath, October 16th, at 11 a. m., and at 7.30 p. m. All are cordially invited to attend.

Dr. Bates is a preacher of more than local reputation, having preached to some of the largest congregations of his church in this country.

He is also an author of some note, having written that very interesting book, "Alleged Discrepencies in the Holy Scriptures."

The Session of the Church has been very fortunate in securing Dr. Bates for two Sabbaths, and it is to be hoped that the people of Oakland and surrounding country will avail themselves of the opportunity to hear this able and gifted preacher.

BITTINGER.

Miss Ida Bowser has been appointed assistant teacher in the Bittinger public school, and entered upon the discharge of her duties last Monday morning.

Norman Patten had his collar bone and several ribs broken one evening last week while assisting in placing a threshing machine in Gus Stanton's barn near this village.

Benjamin Long, of Mt. Lake, was a caller in this village last Saturday and Sunday.

C. J. Brenneman and wife are spending this week in Oakland, where Mrs. Brenneman is undergoing treatment for her eyes.

Albert Brenneman and family spent a few days last week visiting relatives near Meyersdale, Pa.

James P. Wiley spent a few hours last Sunday visiting his brother Thomas B. Wiley at this place.

Mrs. Winterburg, of Grantsville, accompanied by Miss Myrtle Wiley, were visiting here last Sunday.

Mahlon Brenneman, of McHenry, spent last Sunday with relatives here.

The Republican campaign party held a very pleasant and effective meeting in this village on Wednesday afternoon of last week.

Hon. and Mrs. R. T. Browning will leave Oakland tonight for a visit of a week or more to friends and relatives in Washington county, Md., and also to Philadelphia, where they will see their daughter, known to the world as Miss Bessie Browning, but now a sister in a convent in that city.

The World's Wonders

STRANGE THINGS FOUND IN VARIOUS PORTIONS OF THE EARTH

Oyster Farming in Normandy

Oyster cultivation is carried out on a very large scale in France, more especially in the Arcachon basin, at Marennes, at Cancale, and along the coasts of Normandy. In the breeding season, from June to September, the oysters lay eggs or spawn, which the cultivator collects by means of hives (large open cases composed of boards set widely apart and covered with lime to facilitate the removal of the oysters). After emptying the hives the young oysters are taken off the slabs, an operation which must be most carefully performed in order not to crush their fragile shells. In spite of all precautions, about 25 per cent are destroyed. The young oysters are placed in cases called ambulances for two or three months, where they are subjected to a special treatment. The oysters are finally gathered in by hand or by rake, cleaned, and allowed to remain in the basins of the depot, where their flavor is improved.

CHURCH BELLS OF GUATEMALA

Guatemala is a land of earthquakes, and throughout the country wherever the churches have suffered from quakes and the crumbling towers are no longer strong enough to bear the weight of the heavy bells, these are hung out of doors under a pointed thatched roof held up by bamboo poles. These add greatly to the picturesqueness of the landscape.

WILLS A FARM TO MONKEYS

Two pet monkeys are the sole heirs of Dr. J. B. Zudzense, who died at Sparta, Mich. To them the doctor leaves his farm, valued at $3,000, as a home for the remainder of their lives. According to the will Mrs. Sellers, the doctor's housekeeper, may have a home at the farm if she takes proper care of the monkeys. When Dr. Zudzense's wife died two years ago the monkeys were gloomy for weeks. They had been in the family for 10 years. About five years ago, when the doctor was living here, he kept the monkeys in a cage in the front yard. A neighbor's boy was in the habit of teasing them. One day the boy woke up the neighborhood with his terrible screaming, and his grandmother ran into the room to find the two monkeys on his chest biting and scratching him.

GRIM FAMILY DINNER PARTY

A remarkable reason for divorce has come before the court in Chicago. It was the plea of a man who said that he wanted divorce because his wife set plates on the table at each meal for the deceased members of her family, and not satisfied with this, she held imaginary conversations with the deceased during each meal, and conversation generally relating to the quality of the menu, or to striking incidents in the lives of these relatives. The man averred that these uncanny proceedings got on his nerves—he had peculiar chilly and creepy feelings—and that his life had become a veritable burden, and he prayed the relief a divorce assures. The court took the matter under consideration.

HOW MYSTERY WAS SOLVED

The story of a woman's strange presentiment, which led to the discovery of a child who had disappeared from her home, comes from Lavenham, in Suffolk, England. All attempts to find a child of three named Gladys May Bradbrooke had failed in spite of the efforts of the police, who had searched two days and dragged three ponds. On the third day Mrs. Welham, a neighbor, had a presentiment that the child would be found in a disused well some distance from the village. A search was made, and the child's body was found floating in the water, which is ten feet below the ground level.

AN ODD MURDER CLUE.

Examining the body of a murdered woman at Arras, in France, the other day, a doctor noticed finger prints of blood on the right elbow. He removed the piece of skin on which the marks appeared, and as a result of comparing them with the finger prints of several persons suspected of the crime, the woman's husband has now been arrested.

MEMORIAL OF A DISASTER

Located near the margin of a beautiful and romantic little lake, in the Golden Gate park, San Francisco, Cal., stands a handsome marble monument. In a way it is a memorial "monument," being an enduring souvenir of the fearful disaster that visited San Francisco in April, 1906—earthquake and fire. These beautiful and graceful Italian marble columns—the base, and surmounting entablature and frieze, have interesting associations. Formerly they constituted the ornamental front entrance to the palatial residence of the late A. N. Towne railway magnate, who for many years, made his home in San Francisco. His mansion stood on California street on the very summit of the fashionable and aristocratic "Nob Hill." At the time of the great disaster, the building was reduced to a vast heap of wreckage by the flames. Singular to say the front entrance entirely escaped both the violent earth shock, and the consuming flames. The quake did not crack or shatter the marble work, nor did the fire blacken the highly polished stone.

For several years the facade stood untouched. Recently, work was commenced in removing the mass of debris preparatory to rebuilding. Mrs. Towne presented to the city of San Francisco the front portal of the once splendid residence, with the proviso that it should be placed somewhere in Golden Gate park as an enduring souvenir of the great disaster.

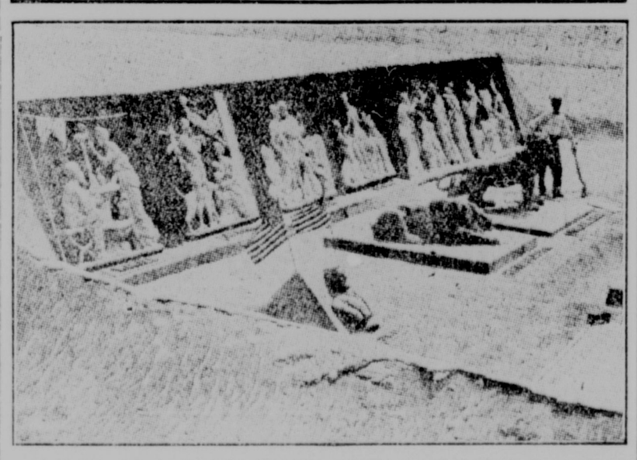
SELLS HIS BODY FOR $50

With less than a fortnight to live John Jurkin, the convicted Ottumwa negro who killed Clara Rosen, at Fort Madison, Ia., and who was hanged at the state penitentiary, sold his dead body to Prof. H. J. Hoove, professor of anatomy of Drake university, Des Moines. It is said that Junkin received $50 for his body. During the few remaining days that he had to live Jurkin spent the money for such good things to eat and smoke as the rules of the prison allowed.

GOLF LINKS AT TIENTSIN

The popular Scottish pastime of golf now seems to have its advocates in every civilized corner of the globe, and in most cases the associations are governed by the rules laid down by the Royal and Ancient Golf club of St. Andrews. The above illustration shows a golfer in the act of putting on the eighteenth green of the Tientsin golf links in China. The tallest figure on the right is presumably his opponent with two native caddies behind him, while on the left is another native holding the flag which marks the green until the player has holed out.

Atlantic City Sand Sculpture



A detail of heavy-footed policemen recently marched along the sands at Atlantic City. In their wake they left wreckage and ruin, for they had ruthlessly walked, wearing their heaviest shoes, over the creations of the sand-artists, stamping the soulful sand figures into the dust from whence they came. Only three of the artists were exempt from the decree of destruction; and this trio will in future be known as the official sand-artists of Atlantic City. The trouble was that some of the artists became too artistic. In some instances they imitated their betters in the great world of art in selecting the human form divine as the foundation for some of their creations. Notwithstanding the fact that nowhere is that form more in evidence than at the seashore, the authorities decided that the sand-artists had gone too far in portraying partially draped figures, and the censor sent forth the stamping squad to rid the beach of the odd designs originated by some of the sand-sculptors. One of the most remarkable set of figures seen on the beach has been built up of sand mixed with some ingredient to make it stable. The artist has fashioned his mixture into a series of heroic poses, and these he has painted white, so that they glisten like genuine marble statues.

NO CLOUDS IN SIGHT

COLONEL GEORGE HARVEY SAYS COUNTRY ALL RIGHT.

THE WRITER SEES NO CLOUD

Striking Article In North American Review That Is Attracting Wide Attention.

The attention of business and professional men in all portions of the country has been attracted to a strikingly strong article by Col. George Harvey in the September issue of the North American Review in which the writer takes a view of the greatest hopefulness for the future of America and Americans. The article is entitled "A Plea for the Conservation of Common Sense," and it is meeting with the cordial approval of business men of all shades of political opinion throughout the entire country. In part, Colonel Harvey says:

"Unquestionably a spirit of unrest dominates the land. But, if it be true that fundamentally the condition of the country is sound, must we necessarily succumb to despondency, abandon effort looking to retrieval and cringe like cravens before clouds that only threaten? Rather ought we not to analyze conditions, search for causes, find the root of the distress, which even now exists only in men's minds, and then, after the American fashion, apply such remedies as seems most likely to produce beneficent results?

Capital and Labor Not Antagonistic.

"The Link that connects labor with capital is not broken but we may not deny that it is less cohesive than it should be or than conditions warrant. Financially, the country is stronger than ever before in its history. Recovery from a panic so severe as that of three years ago was never before so prompt and comparatively complete. The masses are practically free from debt. Money is held by the banks in abundance and rates are low.

"Why, then, does capital pause upon the threshold of investment? The answer, we believe, to be plain. It awaits adjustment of the relations of government to business. * * * The sole problem consists of determining how government can maintain an even balance between aggregations of interests, on the one hand, and the whole people, on the other, protecting the latter against extortion and saving the former from mad assaults.

"The solution is not easy to find for the simple reason that the situation is without precedent. But is not progress being made along sane and cautious lines? * * *

Conserve Common Sense.

"Is not the present, as we have seen, exceptionally secure? What, then, of preparations for the future? Patriotism is the basis of our institutions. And patriotism in the minds of our youth is no longer linked solely with fireworks and deeds of daring. It is taught in our schools. A new course has been added—a course in loyalty. Methodically, our children learn how to vote, how to conduct primaries, conventions and elections, how to discriminate between qualifications of candidates and, finally, how to govern as well as serve. They are taught to despise bribery and all forms of corruption and fraud as treason. Their creed, which they are made to know by heart, is not complex. It is simple, but comprehensive, no less beautiful in diction than lofty in aspiration. These are the pledges which are graven upon their memories:

"As it is cowardly for a soldier to run away from battle, so it is cowardly for any citizen not to contribute his share to the well-being of his country. America is my own dear land; she nourishes me, and I will love her and do my duty to her, whose child, servant and civil soldier I am.

"As the health and happiness of my body depend upon each muscle and nerve and drop of blood doing its work in its place, so the health and happiness of my country depend upon each citizen doing his work in his place.

"These young citizens are our hostages to fortune. Can we not safely assume that the principles animating their lives augur well for the permanency of the Republic? When before have the foundation stones of continuance been laid with such care and promise of durability?

"The future, then, is bright. And the present? But one thing is needful. No present movement is more laudable than that which looks to conservation of natural resources. But let us never forget that the greatest inherent resource of the American people is Common Sense. Let that be conserved and applied without cessation, and soon it will be found that all the ills of which we complain but know not of are only such as attend upon the growing pains of a great and blessed country.

He Knows the Game.

According to the Metropolitan Megazine, Fire Chief John Conway of Jersey City, has solved the baseball excuse question by the posting of the following printed notice on his desk at fire headquarters:

"All requests for leave of absence owing to grandmothers' funerals, lame back, house cleaning, moving, sore throat, headache, brainstorm, cousins' wedding, general indisposition, etc., must be handed to the chief not later than ten o'clock on the morning of the game."

Someone Might Get Hurt.

Pietro had drifted to Florida and was working with a gang at railroad construction. He had been told to beware of rattlesnakes, but assured that they would always give the warning rattle before striking.

One hot day he was eating his noon luncheon on a pine log when he saw a big rattler coiled a few feet in front of him. He eyed the serpent and began to shift his legs over the log. He had barely got them out of the way when the snake's fangs hit the bark beneath him.

"Son of a guna!" yelled Pietro. "Why you no ringa da bell?"—Everybody's Magazine.

"Good-Night and Pleasant Dreams."

Two things mean sweet sleep—a clear conscience and a clean bed. No one is going to put you in a bed they think is not clean, but haven't you noticed sometimes that the pillow cases and sheets have a stale, musty smell, and that they are harsh and have an unpleasant feeling? That is because they are washed with soaps that are full of rosin and strong caustics. There's only one soap for bedding. That is "Easy Task Soap." Pure cocoanut oil, pure borax, naphtha and other healthfully sterilizing and cleansing agents compose "Easy Task Soap," and bedding washed with it is sure to come from the wash so beautiful that it makes the housewife proud.

Pierp's Appetite

J. P. Morgan, Sr., was always a good trencherman in his youth and he has as good an appetite today as he ever had, not only for corned beef and cabbage—his favorite dish—but for other foods. If the Morgan, who dazzled the Teutons with his mathematics when he was a German university post-graduate student, had accepted the chair of mathematics offered to him by Heidelberg, instead of his Yankee corned beef and cabbage it might have been frankfurters and sauerkraut.—New York Press.

Beware the Dog!

A family moved from the city to a suburban locality and were told that they should get a watchdog to guard the premises at night. So they bought the largest dog that was for sale in the kennels of a neighboring dog fancier, who was a German. Shortly afterward the house was entered by burglars, who made a good haul, while the big dog slept. The man went to the dog fancier and told him about it.

"Vell, vat you need now," said the dog merchant, "is a leedle dog to vake up the big dog."—Everybody's.

THE CIRCULAR STAIRCASE

BY MARY ROBERTS RINEHART

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. The servants desert. Gertrude and Halsey arrive with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. Gertrude revealed that she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room shortly before the murder. Detective Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped. Gertrude was suspected because of an injured foot. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey were called away by a telegram. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, told Halsey that while she still loved him, she was to marry another. It developed that Dr. Walker was the man. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Recovering consciousness, she said something had brushed by her on the stairway and she fainted. Bailey is suspected of Armstrong's murder. After "seeing a ghost," Thomas, the lodgekeeper, was found dead with a slip in his pocket bearing the name of "Lucien Wallace." Dr. Walker asked Miss Innes to vacate in favor of Mrs. Armstrong. She refused. A note from Bailey to Gertrude arranging a meeting at night was found. A ladder out of place deepens the mystery.

CHAPTER XXIII—Continued.

Apparently only a few minutes elapsed, during which my eyes were becoming accustomed to the darkness. Then I noticed that the windows were reflecting a faint pinkish light; Liddy noticed it at the same time, and I heard her jump up. At that moment Sam's deep voice boomed from somewhere just below.

"Fire!" he yelled. "The stable's on fire!"

I could see him in the glare dancing up and down on the drive, and a moment later Halsey joined him. Alex was awake and running down the stairs, and in five minutes from the time the fire was discovered three of the maids were sitting on their trunks in the drive, although, excepting a few sparks, there was no fire nearer than 100 yards.

Gertrude seldom loses her presence of mind, and she ran to the telephone. But by the time the Casanova volunteer fire department came toiling up the hill the stable was a furnace, with the Dragon Fly safe but blistered, in the road. Some gasoline exploded just as the volunteer department got to work, which shook their nerves as well as the burning building. The stable, being on a hill, was a torch to attract the population from every direction.

The stable was off the west wing. I hardly know how I came to think of the circular staircase and the unguarded door at its foot. Liddy was putting my clothes into sheets, preparatory to tossing them out the window, when I found her, and I could hardly persuade her to stop.

"I want you to come with me, Liddy," I said. "Bring a candle and a couple of blankets."

She lagged behind considerably when she saw me making for the east wing, and at the top of the staircase she balked.

"I am not going down there," she said firmly.

"There is no one guarding the door down there," I explained. "Who knows?—this may be a scheme to draw everybody away from this end of the house, and let some one in here."

The instant I had said it I was convinced I had hit on the explanation, and that perhaps it was already too late. It seemed to me as I listened that I heard stealthy footsteps on the east porch, but there was so much shouting outside that it was impossible to tell. Liddy was on the point of retreat.

"Very well," I said, "then I shall go down alone. Run back to Mr. Halsey's room and get his revolver. Don't shoot down the stairs if you hear a noise; remember—I shall be down there. And hurry."

I put the candle on the floor at the top of the staircase and took off my bedroom slippers. Then I crept down the stairs, going very slowly, and listening with all my ears. Just at the foot of the stairs I stubbed my toe against Halsey's big chair, and had to stand on one foot in a soundless agony until the pain subsided to a dull ache. And then—I knew I was right. Some one had put a key into the lock, and was turning it. For some reason it refused to work, and the key was withdrawn. There was a muttering of voices outside; I had only a second. Another trial, and the door would open. The candle above made a faint gleam down the well-like staircase, and at that moment, with a second, no more, to spare, I thought of a plan.

The heavy oak chair almost filled the space between the newel post and the door. With a crash I had turned it on its side, wedging it against the door, its legs against the stairs. I could hear a faint scream from Liddy at the crash and then she came down the stairs on a run, with the revolver held straight out in front of her.

"Thank God," she said, in a shaking voice. "I thought it was you."

I pointed to the door, and she understood.

"Call out of the windows at the other end of the house," I whispered. "Run. Tell them not to wait for anything."

It Went Off, Right Through the Door.

She went up the stairs at that, two at a time. Evidently she collided with the candle, for it went out, and I was left in darkness.

I was really astonishingly cool. I remember stepping over the chair and gluing my ear to the door, and I shall never forget feeling it give an inch or two there in the darkness, under a steady pressure from without. But the chair held, although I could hear an ominous cracking of one of the legs. And then, without the slightest warning, the cardroom window broke with a crash. I had my finger on the trigger of the revolver, and as I jumped it went off, right through the door. Some one outside swore roundly, and for the first time I could hear what was said.

"Only a scratch. . . . Men are at the other end of the house. . . . Have the whole rat's nest on us." And a lot of profanity which I won't write down. The voices were at the broken window now, and although I was trembling violently, I was determined that I would hold them until help came. I moved up the stairs until I could see into the cardroom, or rather through it, to the window. As I looked a small man put his leg over the sill and stepped into the room. The curtain confused him for a moment; then he turned, not toward me, but toward the billiard room door. I fired again, and something that was glass or china crashed to the ground. Then I ran up the stairs and along the corridor to the main staircase. Gertrude was standing there, trying to locate the shots, and I must have been a peculiar figure, with my hair in crimps, my dressing-gown flying, no slippers, and a revolver clutched in my hand. I had no time to talk. There was the sound of footsteps in the lower hall, and some one bounded up the stairs.

I had gone Berserk, I think. I leaned over the stair-rail and fired again. Halsey, below, yelled at me.

"What are you doing up there?" he yelled. "You missed me by an inch."

And then I collapsed and fainted. When I came around Liddy was rubbing my temples with eau de quinine, and the search was in full blast.

Well, the man was gone. The stable burned to the ground, while the crowd cheered at every falling rafter, and the volunteer fire department sprayed it with a garden hose. And in the house Alex and Halsey searched every corner of the lower floor, finding no one.

The truth of my story was shown by the broken window and the overturned chair. That the unknown had got upstairs was almost impossible. He had not used the main staircase, there was no way to the upper floor in the east wing, and Liddy had been at the window, in the west wing, where the servants' stair went up. But we did not go to bed at all. Sam Bohannon and Warner helped in the search, and not a closet escaped scrutiny. Even the cellars were given a thorough overhauling, without result. The door in the east entry had a hole through it where my bullet had gone. The hole slanted downward, and the bullet was embedded in the porch. Some reddish stains showed it had done execution.

"Somebody will walk lame," Halsey said, when he had marked the course of the bullet. "It's too low to have hit anything but a leg or foot."

From that time on I watched every person I met for a limp, and to this day the man who halts in his walk is an object of suspicion to me. But Casanova had no lame men; the nearest approach to it was an old fellow who tended the safety gates at the railroad, and he, I learned on inquiry, had two artificial legs. Our man had gone, and the large and expensive stable at Sunnyside was a heap of smoking rafters and charred boards. Warner swore the fire was incendiary, and in view of the attempt to enter the house, there seemed to be no doubt of it.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Flinders.

If Halsey had only taken me fully into his confidence through the whole affair it would have been much simpler. If he had been altogether frank about Jack Bailey, and if the day after the fire he had told me what he suspected, there would have been no harrowing period for all of us, with the boy in danger. But young people refuse to profit by the experience of their elders, and sometimes the elders are the ones to suffer.

I was much used up the day after the fire, and Gertrude insisted on my going out. The machine was temporarily out of commission, and the carriage horses had been sent to a farm for the summer. Gertrude finally got a trap from the Casanova liveryman, and we went out. Just as we turned from the drive into the road we passed a woman. She had put down a small valise, and stood inspecting the house and grounds minutely. I should hardly have noticed her had it not been for the fact that she had been horribly disfigured by smallpox.

"Ugh!" Gertrude said, when we had passed, "what a face! I shall dream of it to-night. Get up, Flinders."

"Flinders?" I asked. "Is that the horse's name?"

"It is." She flicked the horse's stubby mane with the whip. "He didn't look like a livery horse, and the liveryman said he had bought him from the Armstrongs when they purchased a couple of motors and cut down the stable. Nice Flinders—good old boy!"

Flinders was certainly not a common name for a horse, and yet the youngster at Richfield had named his prancing, curly-haired little horse Flinders! It set me to thinking.

At my request Halsey had already sent word of the fire to the agent from whom me had secured the house. Also, he had called Mr. Jamieson by telephone, and somewhat guardedly had told him of the previous night's events. Mr. Jamieson promised to come out that night, and to bring another man with him. I did not consider it necessary to notify Mrs. Armstrong, in the village. No doubt she knew of the fire, and in view of my refusal to give up the house an interview would probably have been unpleasant enough. But as we passed Dr. Walker's white and green house I thought of something.

"Stop here, Gertrude," I said. "I am going to get out."

"To see Louise?" she asked.

"No, I want to ask this young Walker something."

She was curious, I knew, but I did not wait to explain. I went up the walk to the house, where a brass sign at the side announced the office, and went in. The reception room was empty, but from the consultation room beyond came the sound of two voices, not very amicable.

"It is an outrageous figure," some one was storming. Then the doctor's quiet tone, evidently not arguing, merely stating something. But I had not time to listen to some person probably disputing his bill, so I coughed. The voices ceased at once; a door closed somewhere, and the doctor entered from the hall of the house. He looked sufficiently surprised at seeing me.

"Good afternoon, doctor," I said formally. "I shall not keep you from your patient. I wish merely to ask a question."

"Won't you sit down?"

"It will not be necessary. Doctor, has any one come to you, either early this morning or to-day, to have you treat a bullet wound?"

"Nothing so startling has happened to me," he said. "A bullet wound! Things must be lively at Sunnyside."

"I didn't say it was at Sunnyside. But as it happens, it was. If any such case comes to you, will it be too much trouble for you to let me know?"

"I shall be only too happy," he said. "I understand you have had a fire up there, too. A fire and shooting in one night is rather lively for a quiet place like that."

"It is as quiet as a boiler-shop," I replied, as I turned to go.

"And you are still going to stay?"

"Until I am burned out," I responded. And then, on my way down the steps, I turned around suddenly.

"Doctor," I asked at a venture, "have you ever heard of a child named Lucien Wallace?"

Clever as he was, his face changed and stiffened. He was on his guard again in a moment.

"Lucien Wallace?" he repeated. "No, I think not. There are plenty of Wallaces around, but I don't know any Lucien."

I was as certain as possible that he did. People do not lie readily to me, and this man lied beyond a doubt. But there was nothing to be gained now; his defenses were up, and I left, half irritated and wholly baffled.

Our reception was entirely different at Dr. Stewart's. Taken into the bosom of the family at once, Flinders tied outside and nibbling the grass at the roadside, Gertrude and I drank some home-made elderberry wine and told briefly of the fire. Of the more serious part of the night's experience, of course, we said nothing. But when at last we had left the family on the porch and the good doctor was untying our steed, I asked him the same question I had put to Dr. Walker.

"Shot!" he said. "Bless my soul, no. Why, what have you been doing up at the big house, Miss Innes?"

"Some one tried to enter the house during the fire, and was shot and slightly injured," I said hastily. "Please don't mention it; we wish to make as little of it as possible."

There was one other possibility, and we tried that. At Casanova station I saw the station master, and asked him if any trains left Casanova between one o'clock and daylight. There was none until 6 a. m. The next question required more diplomacy.

"Did you notice on the six o'clock train any person—any man—who limped a little?" I asked. "Please try to remember; we are trying to trace a man who was seen loitering around Sunnyside last night before the fire."

He was all attention in a moment.

"I was up there myself at the fire," he said volubly. "I'm a member of the volunteer company. First big fire we've had since the summer house burned over to the club golf links. My wife was sayin' the other day, 'Dave, you might as well 'a' saved the money in that there helmet and shirt.' And here last night they came in handy. Rang that bell so hard I hadn't time scarcely to get 'em on."

"And—did you see a man who limped?" Gertrude put in, as he stopped for breath.

"Not at the train, ma'm," he said. "No such person got on here to-day. But I'll tell you where I did see a man that limped. I didn't wait till the company left; there's a fast freight goes through at 4:45, and I had to get down to the station. I seen there wasn't much more to do anyhow at the fire—we'd got the flames under control"—Gertrude looked at me and smiled—"so I started down the hill. There was folk here and there goin' home, and along by the path to the Country club I seen two men. One was a short fellow. He was sittting on a big rock, his back to me, and he had something white in his hand, as if he was tying up his foot. After I'd gone on a piece I looked back, and he was hobbling on and—excuse me, miss—he was swearing something sickening."

Marvels of Modern Surgery.

Knife operations on the stomach have given a death rate of from one to 20 per cent., against 20 to 40 per cent. ten years ago. Cutting open the upper abdomen, splitting the stomach open and turning it wrong side out, searching for cancers and ulcers, has become a not uncommon operation, often followed by great cures and benefits, and is largely an American specialty. — New York Press.

So large is his collection that he has set apart one room in his home in Plainfield as a stamp room, in which are some of the rarest of stamps, so dear to the heart of the philatelist.

Social Conditions in Large Cities

By REV. GEORGE W. McDANIEL, D.D.
Pastor of First Baptist Church
Richmond, Va.

Text: Lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God.

I wish there were no occasion for this sermon. There are many sensitive souls whom its plain language may offend. They do not believe that such subjects belong properly to pulpit treatment. However, I speak because my conscience bids me. This service is the discharge of a painful duty. "Do I seek to please men? If I yet please men, I should not be the servant of Christ. The church members of our city in their attitude toward moral conditions may be grouped in four classes. First, those who do not know. They are good people, who attend church. They know nothing of the sin and shame of the city streets. Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. Second, those who know, but do not care. They have no sense of personal responsibility, since they are not participants in the wrong. Their chief concern is in taking care of self. Third, those who know, but say they cannot change conditions. Sin has always existed and always will. The scarlet woman has been in the world since the days of Solomon. It is useless to attempt to purify city life and improve social conditions. Whoever makes the effort is striking his head against a stone wall. Fourth, those who know conditions, feel their responsibility as citizens and Christians and endeavor to remedy the existing conditions. They may not like the crack of my rifle, but nevertheless, I am determined to take the shot.

With this in view I, accompanied by an officer in citizen's clothes, took two walks down Broad street and saw sights which I blush to mention. The first was on Thursday night, the first clear night after about ten days of rain. They had come out like the insects from under bark and sod, with the first return of the spring sun. They swarmed the streets until it was difficult and, in some respects, dangerous to walk. Girls resorted to the back parlors of Italian confectionaries, where they sat in suggestive positions to welcome and tempt whoever might enter therein. An older girl, on evil bent, led her little sister on her perilous mission. Others whose lives disgraced the name of woman stood on corners or marched brazenly down the street. Boys in knee trousers and girls in short dresses were out in the darkness of the night, when they should have been at home. Mashers followed girls from block to block and around corner after corner, and led them down dark alleys. All of this and more I saw. 'Twas enough to make the head heavy and the heart sick.

On the second night we visited the moving pictures. I saw nothing objectionable per se in the pictures. A minister was present, and they would be guilty of no impropriety. All classes and conditions were in attendance. A dude, dressed in Prince Albert, a bloated faced sport and a weasley halfed man were there, who bought tickets in rotation and entered one after the other. Little children under ten and haggled old women with bent forms were there. What have you to say about these shows? Two things: First, they prove the text and demonstrate that the American people are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. On two blocks on Broad street last Friday night more people saw the moving pictures than assembled in seventy of the eighty white churches of this city. They lined the block and backed up on the side street waiting for admission and yet we say this is a Christian city. Would that it were, but many of the church members love the places of pleasure more than the house of God. They are too tired to attend the church on Sunday evening, but can parade the streets and stand for a long time and spend hours seeing moving pictures and vaudeville after a hard day's work. Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!

Passing from the places of pleasure, we saw young girls, whose mothers thought they were in no harm, entering automobiles and going on joy rides with young men who meant no good. One of the most demoralizing agencies in Richmond is the automobile of the son of the rich. If you want to ruin your son, get him an automobile. Not more than one out of ten can own a machine without neglecting his business or injuring his morals. If the numbers of the machines that ride slowly along Broad street to entice young girls coming from the plays, or stand on Mayo and East Franklin streets after the midnight hours, were published in the daily papers, they would strike many hearts with consternation, and arouse the rich to the danger of their sons. If our papers want something sensational call their attention to this field of investigation.

It is not pleasant for one to speak so plainly about the deplorable conditions in the city that we love, but to keep silent is a sin. To submit without a protest is to stifle conscience and betray a trust. We boast of our city as a churchgoing, well governed town. The conditions which I saw convince me that Richmond is an apple orchard without but rotting at the core. The social impurity and moral degradation are indescribable and unspeakable. As the city grows in size, it grows in wickedness. Can we check this evil? If not, we are to go the way of other cities.

Saving Money at Home.

There's lots of wastefulness in soap. People usually argue that a cake of soap costs five cents and that's all there is to it. But it isn't. "Easy Task Soap," for example, does twice the work of cheap, common rosin soaps, and costs the same. It does the work quicker, better and much more easily. Its saving qualities only begin with its price; it saves clothes, fuel and health. Don't use uncertain soaps. Get Easy Task at your grocer's.

Foiled.

He was very bashful and she tried to make it easy for him. They were driving along the seashore and she became silent for a time. "What's the matter?" he asked.

"O, I feel blue," she replied. "Nobody loves me and my hands are cold."

"You should not say that," was his word of consolation, "for God loves you, and your mother loves you, and you can sit on your hands."—Success Magazine.

TIME TO CHECK CROTHERS.

I am the state, says Governor Crothers, in effect. I have been insulted, the state has been insulted, and, therefore, all the powers of the state may be invoked against the Police Commissioners. This kind of executive interpretation is new to this city, although it is as old as despotism. The actual issue is too trivial to warrant the amount of turmoil it has created. Sifted down, it is merely a personal grievance of the Governor against the Police Board. He wanted its members to take action for the retirement of certain police officials. They, in pursuance of their sworn obligation to discharge their duty according to their intelligence and conscience, declined. Hence the Governor has taken preliminary steps to call out the state troops: Were the subject not so serious the very buffoonery of it would make it a theme for one of the merriest comic operas ever staged. The situation created by Governor Crothers arose from the fact that the members of the Police Board would not bend to his will, but held in first regard their obligation to the people of Baltimore, and were determined not to still further strengthen the odious state rule over the Baltimore police force. They are, therefore, declared to be in a state of insurrection and objects worthy of the most summary treatment by the Governor.

The members of the Police Board, acting upon advice of counsel, placed a police guard at the doors of their offices to prevent the records being seized by the Governor, or the entrance of other persons into positions they had been advised were not legally vacated or even temporarily forfeited. This appeared to be the only way to get the contention before the courts, where its belongs. Governor Crothers is noted as saying that the courts have no cognizance of the matter. Some one would do a friendly act for the Governor if he would tell him that he is riding a horse a bit higher than the American people ever allow a public servant to bestride, when he declares there is no power of appeal from his acts. This kind of twaddle is but cheap buncombe. The people are protected from usurpation of authority by the courts. They have every right to have any case affecting the public welfare adjudicated. The judiciary is a co-ordinate function with the executive. It runs with the executive office. Those who advise Governor Crothers differently advised him against law, against reason and against public peace. There is not an act of any public official for which there is not, specified or implied in conditions of the tenure of the office, ample provision for a review by the courts. The Governor is assuming untenable ground and he will find that any act of arbitrary defiance of the adjudicatory power of the courts will be regarded as little short of insurrection—the word he uses with regard to the Police Board—against the highest prerogative in the state, the will of the people, as assured by the courts. The right way to settle the dispute, for which the Governor is alone responsible, is through the courts. The Governor under the Constitution has no power to suspend from office civil officers without or before a trial or hearing.

The State of Maryland is disgraced by a tin-whistle squabble because the Governor has assumed the attitude of doing the thing he is bent on doing in the wrong way. The spectacle of militia being called out to arbitrate by force dissensions between public officials has disgraced some of the Southern states, but Maryland does not belong to the list of states that turn to rifle rule. The calling out of the state militia in support of his mandate with regard to the Police Board will be taken as a most ominous sign of the trend of the present administration of the state. It will furnish full justification for all that has been alleged as to the ulterior designs of Mr. Crothers. It will bring the issue squarely to the people whether they are willing to have it avowed that the reign of law has fallen down in Maryland.

Governor Crothers is creating an extremely serious situation by even raising the question of state enforcement of his personal position, and he will do well to ponder precedents that have strewn the path of public office with the wrecks of men as tenacious as himself in unwarranted positions. A sign of sanity is the repudiation by the Attorney General of responsibility for the Governor's threat to invoke the armed forces of the state when as yet, there has been no overt act by which even remotely the fantastic charge of insurrection could be raised. A governor who cannot govern himself is incapable of governing the people. He needs to be governed. It is time to call a halt on Crothers.—Baltimore American.

The Advocate is the name of Lonaconing's new weekly newspaper, it taking the place of The Star which ceased publication two weeks ago when editor J. J. Robinson laid down the editorial pen after more than twenty years of service as editor and manager. The Advocate is being published by a stock company composed of the business men of Lonaconing. Mr. J. Elliott Baldwin has been elected editor. The Advocate comes into the field of Western Maryland journalism at an opportune time, as with the cessation of the publication of The Star Lonaconing would have been without a newspaper. The energetic business men of that enterprising town deserve great credit for their foresight in forming a company and issuing The Advocate. May it long prosper.

Grantsville Men Sell Timber Land.

Charles H. Bill, of Grantsville, made a trip to Confluence where he succeeded in closing the sale of 185 acres of good timber near Bear creek, in Garrett county, Md., belonging to himself and Squire Peter Nathan, of Grantsville, to E. Vansickle, of Ursina. Messrs. Bill & Nathan have have just finished sawing a tract of timber near the one they sold. They yet have on hand 350,000 feet of sawed lumber. After this is disposed of, Mr. and Mrs. Bill will start for the Pacific coast on a pleasure trip. Mr. Bill who was one of the editor's most intimate boyhood chums, called at The Republican office between trains Monday to renew the ties of friendship that have existed for more than 50 years. When still quite a young man, Mr. Bill located at Racine, Wis., where he accumulated a comfortable fortune in the shoe business, after which he returned to his native village to enjoy life amid the friends and scenes of his youth. Should he decide to locate in the west again, Grantsville will lose one of its most affable and popular citizens. However, he has interests and kindred ties at Grantsville that will probably serve to hold him there for years to come. So mote it be.—Meyersdale Republican.

Wrecks Saturday Night.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has been particularly unfortunate recently in the number of disastrous wrecks which have occurred in this vicinity, as one wreck is hardly cleared up before another occurs. Saturday night two mishaps took place, the first on the Seventeen-mile Grade when five freight cars were piled up on account of a broken axle under one of the cars. This was followed by a sidewipe between two freight trains at Mt. Lake Park, which fortunately was not of a serious nature. In neither were any of the railroad employees hurt, although a narrow escape was experienced by a brakeman on the grade wreck who had to run over the tops of four or five cars before he got out of the danger zone. Trains were delayed four or five hours, the fast New-York St. Louis passenger and express No. 1 due here at 10.30 p. m., not arriving here until nearly three o'clock Sunday morning.

It is little use for the local editor to waste his lungs and sprain his spine in trying to boom a town when the citizens all stand around with their hands in their pockets and indifferently wait for something to turn up. If the capitalists or business men do not put their shoulders to the wheel and do a little boosting it is useless for the editor to try to boom things. He can write boom articles till he gets bald headed, but if the citizens themselves do not take hold and push, the town will forever stick in the mud. Of what use is it for the local paper to suggest improvements and new enterprises if the suggestions are never acted upon? One man cannot boom a town. It requires the concerted action of the citizens. When one man shoulders a town and attempts to carry in there are always a lot of cranky kickers ready to jump on top of the load. Unity of action is what counts.—Moorefield Examiner.

A Good Position

Can be had by ambitious young men and ladies in the field of "Wireless" or Railway telegraphy. Since the 8-hour law became effective, and since the Wireless companies are establishing stations throughout the county there is a great shortage of telegraphers. Positions pay beginners from $70 to $90 per month, with good chance of advancement. The National Telegraph Institute operates six official institutes in America, under supervision of R. R. and Wireless officials and places all graduates into positions. It will pay you to write them for full details at Cincinnati, O., or Philadelphia, Pa.

IRONTON HEATER—Natural Gas only

No. 2. Width 20 in. Depth 10 in. Height 34 in. Price $10.00

One of the neatest stoves made for living rooms, dining rooms, parlors, fine offices, etc. Front of stove 20 in., back 14½ in.; by this construction the stove is given a wonderful heating force with half the gas taken for the ordinary stove. Will comfortably heat the largest rooms in zero weather.

Body made of Wood's planished iron, lined with polished copper, fancy carved cast iron top, base, foot rail and feet. All cast parts highly polished and finished in oxidized copper, nickeled name plate, ornament and urn Exposed parts protected with heavy asbestos board to prevent tarnishing from the effects of the heat. Guards 50 cents extra.

EVERY IRONTON HEATER is sold with the positive guarantee that if it does not do the work required of it after ten days' trial, it may be returned, and all the money paid for it will be refunded. No chances taken when you buy the Ironton Heater.

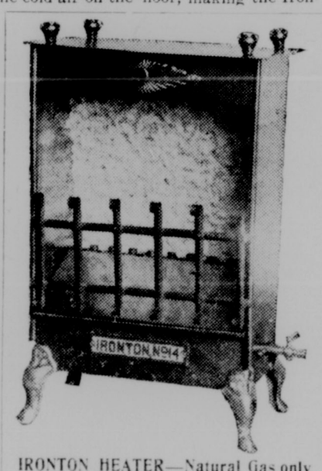
THE IRONTON HEATERS pay for themselves. In combination with the powerful Bunsen burner flame and the correct interior construction of our stoves, a great volume of cold air is taken from the floor through the flame, heated to a high temperature and with our patent baffle and reflection plates the heated air thrown out and down to the floor where needed. In a remarkably short time all the cold air in the room is circulated through the stove and the room is warm. THE IRONTON heats a room quicker and with less gas than any stove on the market.

THE IRONTON HEATS THE FLOOR. By the new and scientific construction of the stove the intense heat rays from the Bunsen flame and the highly heated cold air from the floor is thrown back to the floor and far out into the room, immediately displacing the cold air on the floor, making the Ironton the most effective foot warmer ever devised.

THE IRONTON WILL VENTILATE THE ROOM. If the Ironton is connected with a draft it will as effectually ventilate a room as the old coal grate, without impairing its heating force, in fact if a moderate draft is given the stove the heat thrown out is increased, because more cold air is circulated through the stove.

VENT PIPE TO THE IRONTON. We recommend vent pipes be connected to all gas stoves, but if you need heat in a room which has no flue connection buy the Ironton. It will give you a dry, clean heat, free from gas odor.

The Ironton Heaters give as good results without flue connection as any stove made. Try one of these wonderful heaters for ten days, if then you don't think it the best and most economical heater you ever saw, return it to your dealer.



IRONTON HEATER—Natural Gas only

Four Sizes; Prices, $4.50 to $7.50.

Body made of Wood's planished iron, polished copper linings, nickeled knobs, ornamented feet. Exposed parts protected with asbestos board. Guards extra, 50 cents.

The hunting season is here and sportsmen should be careful to look into the laws and observe them before going out to hunt. Another thing that it might be well to remember. There is not the wealth of game in the woods that there used to be and hunters should not be "game hogs" and endeavor to kill off all the game in a single season. A true sportsman will not take pleasure in killing as much game as it is possible for him to kill, but he will rather remember that there are other years coming, and when he gets just enough game to make the day both pleasurable and profitable, he will leave the woods and return home.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Christian Felty took place last Friday morning from the residence of the deceased lady's sister, Miss Mollie Porter, on Alder street. Rev. John M. Davis conducted the services in the presence of a number of sympathizing friends and relatives. The minister recounted in his remarks the Christian spirit manifested at all times by the deceased and the pure life of devotion to her family and friends. Those who attended the funeral from a distance were Mr. and Mrs. F. Felty, of Uniontown, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. Robert Felty, of Springfield, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey Felty, and Mr. Charles Porter, of Cumberland; Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Felty, of Dayton, Ohio; Mrs. D. Grant Smith, of Cumberland, and Mr. and J. M. Keene, of Belair, Md.

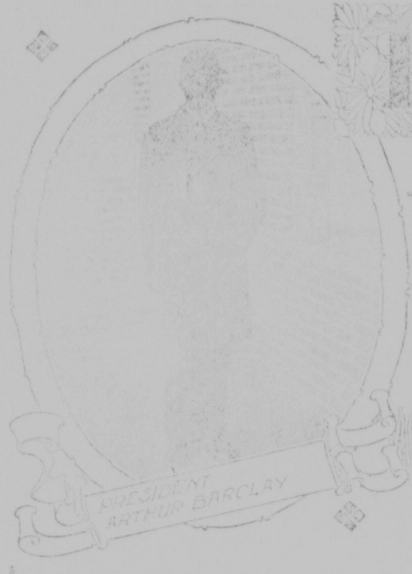
THE NEGRO PROBLEM IN LIBERIA

BY OVERTON PRICE



THE first idea of a "Liberia"—settlement of free negroes—arose with the foundation of the British colony of Sierra Leone. After the close of the American War of Independence in 1783 it became necessary to provide for the negro troops who had served Great Britain faithfully in that unhappy struggle. They were at first deported to Nova Scotia, but had no place there in the body politic of white men; they were no longer slaves, but the idea of granting the suffrage to negroes was then displeasing to the dominant race. There was also the problem of the free Maroon negroes of Jamaica, who were irksome to the authorities in a land of slavery. So the idea of founding a free negro state or community in West Africa for the reception of enfranchised American negroes came into being about 1784, and in 1787 the colony of Sierra Leone was founded under a chartered company and taken over by the crown in 1808.

Early in the nineteenth century the same difficulty arose in the United States, namely, the presence of thousands of free negroes whose case had not been sufficiently provided for by the American Constitution. Somehow or other these free negroes and mulattoes—growing impatient of being taxed without representation—must be provided for. So several philanthropists, remembering Sierra Leone, thought to promote by private enterprise and philanthropy a similar colony across the sea which might provide for the return to West Africa (whence most of them had come) of the freed slaves of the United States. Indeed, there was a strong disposition to adopt Sierra Leone for this purpose, with the assent of the British government; but the local authorities of Sierra Leon showed themselves very averse from receiving American negroes, who might owe a divided allegiance.

Accordingly the American founders of "Liberia" (this name was not given to the infant state until 1824)—who were mostly white men with a few mulattoes and negroes—selected the Grain Coast, immediately to the south and east of Sierra Leone, for their experiment.

It was some weeks before the hostility of the natives, who were wedded to the slave trade, could be overcome, but in 1822 active operations were begun. A thirty-acre tract was allotted to each man with the means of cultivating it. The National Colonization society's agents became discouraged at the difficulties that were met and returned to America with a few faint-hearted ones; but the others rallied about a determined negro, Elijah Johnson, and remained. The colony was enlarged by the addition of new tracts. New settlements were afterward formed at Cape Monte and in the newly acquired Bassa Land, in which, in 1824, a town was founded and called Edina, in acknowledgment of pecuniary aid sent from Edinburgh. Many of the neighboring chiefs were received into the colony, and others were subdued. Trials of many kinds, deprivations and dissensions were the lot of the colony, managed by a society which did not fully know whether its aims were sentimental or practical. In 1847 Liberia was left to its own resources and declared an independent republic. The colony immediately began to show more prosperity, numerous churches and schools were founded, newspapers were established, and slavery in the neighboring states was abolished. The first president of independent Liberia was Roberts, an octoroon. He was a most able and courageous man and the country made rapid strides in civilization and other material lines of progress under his administration.

A NATIVE CHRISTIAN FAMILY

The constitution of the republic is framed after that of the United States. There are a president, vice-president, a council of six ministers and a house of representatives. Voters must be of negro blood and own real estate. The natives generally do not avail themselves of the suffrage. No foreigner can own land without the consent of the government. The coast territory is formed into the counties of Bassa, Cape Palmas and Sinoe, with one superintendent each, and Montserrado, with four superintendents. The capital is Monrovia, named after President Monroe. English money is used, but American money figures usually in the keeping of accounts. There is a Liberian coinage and a rather large paper currency. The official language of the country is English. The civilized inhabitants are orthodox Protestants, mostly Episcopalians.

During the fifties and sixties of the last century the Americo-Liberians did much to explore the interior and enter into treaty relationships with the native chiefs. But thirty years ago their administration began to get into financial difficulties. It is not an easy thing to create a well-ordered, well-governed state in tropical Africa without a considerable capital to draw on. Consider for a moment what Great Britain has spent on Sierra Leone since 1787, and on the Gold Coast wars, the opening up of Nigeria; or the outlay of France on Senegambia or Dahomey; and then imagine how the government of Liberia could without any reserve of capital bring law, order and civilization into a densely forested territory nearly the size of England, with a probable population of over a million warlike savages and semi-savages.

So long as Britain and France—the controlling powers—contented themselves with the mere occupation of a few coast towns on the seaboard of their West African dominions or protectorates, the Monrovia government could afford to do the same. But when these great European powers were compelled by force of circumstances to occupy and administer the regions behind their coasts the Liberians found themselves in a position of great difficulty. They had been allotted theoretically by France and England a considerable hinterland—more than 50,000 square miles—and were held responsible for the doings of the native tribes in that extensive interior. Now these tribes had never been subdued by the government of the republic. They were many of them in treaty relationships with the Monrovia administration, and such of them as had heard of the civilized negro government on the coast (and it must be remembered that much of the interior is dense forest, inhabited by tribes who for ages have been isolated in that forest, and were—and are—quite ignorant of the world outside their tribal land) were quite willing to regard the Liberians as the ruling power on the seashore. But they were very disinclined to obey orders from Monrovia if contrary to their own desires.

The tribes farthest inland looked upon the British and French—the "white men"—as aggressors who were putting down by force a most lucrative slave trade, who were forcibly disclosing the secrets of sacred streams like the Niger near its sources, who, in short, were not only to be opposed, but whose organized territories offered a most profitable field for raids and robberies. More than this: the import of guns, gunpowder, rifles (above all) and alcohol was being restricted or forbidden by the Europeans. The Liberian coast, especially where it was slenderly guarded by the Liberian administration, offered the one loophole through which these forbidden goods might be smuggled. Accordingly a great trade sprang up between these uncontrolled hinterland tribes and the Kru people on the coast, who affected a sort of detachment from the government by the American-Negro republic. In these ways the Liberian hinterland became a positive source of danger and expense to the British protectorate of Sierra Leone and the French possessions of the Sudan and Ivory Coast.

A NATIVE VILLAGE IN THE INTERIOR

VIEW OF CAPE PALMAS

CELEBRATING THE LIBERIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Consequently the Liberian government has been forced of late years to live somewhat beyond its means in organizing a police and a marine, in occupying the Kru coast and in attempting to construct roads to places of importance in the interior. It has from time to time engaged European officers for its services; but whereas some of these engagements have been of noteworthy success, others have been the reverse, and it is difficult to locate the blame. European capital is somewhat shy of Liberia, partly owing to the turbulence of the interior natives (though this has been exaggerated, for white men very seldom really incur danger from the indigenes), but more on account of the irresponsible fickleness of the legislature, which is given too much to the hasty making and unmaking of laws and to conflicts of opinion with the executive.

Yet the country is extremely rich. Its rocks and river valleys produce both gold and diamonds, some of the coast districts (especially in the east) even give indications of the existence of bitumen, or oil-bearing strata, while the forests of the interior are remarkable for their wealth of rubber-bearing trees and lianas, their ebony, African teak and "mahogany," and the plassava fiber (derived from the raphia palm), which is used for so many purposes connected with the making of brooms and brushes. Then there is the oil-palm, with its two kinds of oil, both valuable to commerce—the oil of the husk and that of the kernel. The extraction of this last and its great value for special industries are said to have been discovered some seventy-five years ago by an American negro, one of the early colonists of Liberia. A great deal was done by these freed slave settlers, for which they have never received sufficient credit.

Unfortunately the attempted colonization of Liberia has been hindered by the American negro colonists proving almost as much liable to malarial fever and other African diseases as Europeans. They seem to have lost the relative immunity from these blood-germ maladies which their African ancestors enjoyed. The modern America-Liberian does not stand the climate of Liberia much better than the white man from Europe or America. The country is not unhealthy in the interior; it is the coast belt which, with its eternal heat and moisture, its very short dry seasons, and torrential rains (conditions which suit admirably the cultivation of rubber, coffee and cacao) saps the vitality of residents not of African birth. And the hinterland, with its superior conditions of climate, has already a somewhat large indigenous population, who are not eager for foreign additions to their numbers.

Hiring Help In East Africa

The "servant problem" is bad enough in America, and the experiences mistresses have to relate are many and varied; but an infinitely wider range of possibilities is opened up when mere man—and a bachelor at that—tackles the servant and other household problems in an East African bungalow. Anything can happen—and does happen!

Native house servants of a sort are plentiful enough around the chief towns of British East Africa, Nairobi and Mombasa, and the slightest rumor that the Muzungu (white man) requires a "boy" or m'pezi (cook) fills one's compound with cooks, "generals" and raw niggers, representing every tribe under Africa's sun, a writer in the Wide World says.

The average bachelor contents himself with four servants—a head "boy," a cook, a "toto" (youth) to assist them, and a m'shenzi (raw, untrained native) for odd jobs, gardening, etc.

It is no easy task to make a selection from the host of eager, voluble applicants. Dirty, carefully stuck-together "baruas" (testimonials) are examined and the owners questioned, but it is unwise to put much faith in these documents, for it is no unusual occurrence for a "boy"—on the principle of "the more the merrier"—to proudly present you with three testimonials, every one bearing a different name from the one under which he introduces himself!

These gentry are always greatly offended when you kick them off the veranda and tell them they have bought or stolen the documents from other natives! Upon one occasion a would-be cook brought me a "barua" signed by a well-known hotelier and worded:

"To whom it may concern: The bearer of this 'barua' is an infernal rogue and thief. Please kick him out."

By the time I had stopped laughing the nigger had arrived at the conclusion that something was wrong and was doing record time down the path, so I was unable to avail myself of the kind invitation.

HORSE TRADE IN MISSOURI.

In St. Charles last week Lester Ingraham traded A. S. Osborn a horse for a motor boat. A few hours later Osborn discovered that the horse was worthless, so he went to the boat and removed the engine and the horse died as he was hauling it away. A jury in a justice's court awarded Ingraham the engine and $1 damages.—Detroit Free Press.

A TIMELY WARNING.

Backache, headaches, dizzy spells and distressing urinary troubles warn you of dropsy, diabetes and fatal Bright's disease. Act in time by curing the kidneys with Doan's Kidney Pills. They have cured thousands and will cure you.

Mrs. Frances Collins, nurse, Box 30, Boonville, Mo., says: "For 20 years I suffered from kidney trouble. I had back pains and was bothered by dizziness. I became tired easily and was very nervous. The kidney secretions also proved annoying. Doan's Kidney Pills benefited me promptly. They have my highest endorsement."

Public Want Ads.

Wanted—Several nice old gentlemen to represent us financially. Nothing to do but utter wise remarks and indorse dividend checks. Good wages, from fifty to one hundred millions a year.

Wanted—A financier who will guarantee to keep us supplied with half-colleges and half-libraries while we supply the other halves. No experience required. Good rake-off.

Wanted—At once. A large number of stockholders to take charge of our food supply and keep us from eating too much. No regular hours. Palm Beach in winter, Adirondacks in summer.

Wanted—A few select persons to represent us socially and do the things we haven't time for. No brains needed. All expenses paid. No worry. —Success.

Saucy Soldier Shut Her Up.

Col. Robert G. Cantey of a Nashville hospital was talking about campaign comforts.

"Then there was Dash of Company A," he said. "Dash had the reputation of being the nastiest-tongued man in the regiment.

"It was Private Dash, you know, who, out foraging one evening on a rich estate, came accidentally upon the owner's wife, a grande dame in evening dress.

"Dash asked her for food. She refused him. He asked again. But, still refusing, she walked away.

"'No,' she said, 'I'll give you nothing, trespassing like this. I'll give you nothing. My mind is made up.'

"'Made up, is it?' said Dash. 'Like the rest of you, eh?'"

PUZZLED

Hard Work, Sometimes, to Raise Children.

Children's taste is oftimes more accurate, in selecting the right kind of food to fit the body, than that of adults. Nature works more accurately through the children.

A Brooklyn lady says: "Our little boy had long been troubled with weak digestion. We could never persuade him to take more than one taste of any kind of cereal food. He was a weak little chap and we were puzzled to know what to feed him on.

"One lucky day we tried Grape-Nuts. Well, you never saw a child eat with such a relish, and it did me good to see him. From that day on it seemed as though we could almost see him grow. He would eat Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper, and I think he would have liked the food for dinner.

"The difference in his appearance is something wonderful.

"My husband had never fancied cereal foods of any kind, but he became very fond of Grape-Nuts and has been much improved in health since using it.

"We are now a healthy family, and naturally believe in Grape-Nuts.

"A friend has two children who were formerly afflicted with rickets. I was satisfied that the disease was caused by lack of proper nourishment. They showed it. So I urged her to use Grape-Nuts as an experiment and the result was almost magical.

"They continued the food and today both children are well and strong as any children in this city, and, of course, my friend is a firm believer in Grape-Nuts for she has the evidence before her eyes every day."

FOR EARLY FALL

WHEN summer millinery begins to look jaded and it is still too warm for heavy winter hats, one must take to "between seasons" millinery or to the styles that come under the head of "all-the-year-round" millinery. The silk covered hats that appear in September and those made of silk fancy braids offer the best choice to the purchaser for a number of seasons. First because they are not too heavy looking for warm autumn days; then they are conservative in shape, not running to any extremes, and they are very durable and able to stand the little spells of bad weather that portend the coming winter. After serving their purpose for fall, they come in handy during the winter for stormy weather when the best hat must be saved, and they prove altogether desirable for general utility until early spring arrives and demands its own between seasons head wear.

These hats are manufactured ready for trimming and are excellent in shape and fit well on the head. As a rule no bandean is required with them, and they are therefore easy for the home milliner to manage.

The trimmings selected must be in harmony with the shape, that is designed to withstand weather and wear. Natural or very well made wings, fancy feathers, ribbons, velvet and compact, strong-colored fall flowers give one an ample choice—malines, especially those that are waterproofed, are very useful and the fashion of drawing maline over the feather trimming to keep it from blowing about is sensible and pretty as well as thoroughly appreciated.

In fashioning the trimming for such a hat, folds and plaitings or other compact arrangements of the fabric used, are altogether desirable for they are not easily disarranged. The hats of silk braid and silk hats with velvet facings are often simply trimmed with big bows made of taffeta or corded silk. A single strip of silk is split along the center, lengthwise, hemmed at the edges and stiffened by thrusting a fine wire in the hems. A single large mow and collar made of two yards of silk, which makes a strip four yards long, is all the trimming required. Its great advantage lies in the fact that it may be taken off, freshened, pressed and replaced on the hat.

There are any number of pretty and inexpensive fancy feathers to choose from and they are all made from the plumage of domestic fowls or birds that we may use with a clear conscience. Wings always make a smart trimming and the big ornaments, many of them in Persian colorings and designs, are destined to be a great help to the amateur milliner in turning out a creditable and useful hat.

PLAIN AND DAINTY.

This is quite a plain blouse made with pointed yoke at the back; it is suitable for making up in almost any washing blouse material. One tuck an inch wide is carried from waist to shoulder each side front, where it is joined to the yoke; there is a wide box-pleat in center under which are hooks and eyes or buttons for fastening.

The deep turn-over collar and pointed cuffs are bound with plain material. A kid belt and crepe-de-Chine tie are worn.

Material required, 2¾ yards 28 inches wide.

Neck Ruches.

Crocheted neck ruches are a novel idea and very smart and practical. If sewed to folds of lawn or linen these ruchings may be laundered without taking apart. Dainty shades of wash material to match gowns may also be used, and a chiffon fold next to the throat adds to the attractiveness of the same.

FOLLOW ONE COLOR SCHEME

Advice From Writer Who Should Be an Expert on Art of Dressing Economically.

It seems strange that more women who must practice economy in dressing do not follow a distinct color scheme. I find it best to use the same color for a year; then have a change for the sake of variety. In this way all of one's accessories correspond, and a much better effect is produced for the same expenditure of money. The "best" afternoon gown may be worn with either the summer or winter hat and yet look as if they were made for each other. Girdles, collars, and parasols may always be made to do double or triple duty, and yet always be exquisite taste. This idea is not new, but it is surprising how seldom we see it carried out by the woman of moderate income; more often we hear the explanation that the blue gown was chosen because "I haven't had anything blue for an age," and it is accordingly worn with a brown coat, tan gloves and a black hat.—The Housekeeper.

Milady's Lockets.

The newest lockets are very large.

They are worn on a slender gold or platinum chain.

The locket itself is studded with brilliants or colored stones.

These are of course only for "dress-up" occasions.

For street or day wear the jeweled locket seems out of place.

For this purpose there are many in silver and steel which are both appropriate and chic.

With two or three imitation dark stones the effect is elegant without being overdone.

Are Long Skirts to Come?

Not yet has the long skirt come to be accepted for other than dressy wear, yet the makers of fashion recommend it for more constant use, and the American women are adopting it slowly.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

DOCTORS ALTER THEIR VIEWS

Where Moderation Was Permitted Few Years Ago Total Abstinence Now Recommended.

The bishop of Durham said recently in a public sermon:

"We find now the constant and agreement of doctors on the subject of alcohol to a vast degree going in a direction opposite to that which they took in 1859. Then their opinion might be summed up thus:

"'A little wine or beer or a very moderate amount of spirits is good for most people, but there are some who can do without it, and some who would be much better without it.

"Their opinion summed up now would be something like this:

"'For the vast majority of the human race nothing of the kind is the best rule; there are a few exceptions for whom it is either good or gives no harm.'"

It has been many years since those who spoke of the dangers lurking in the use of alcohol were scoffed at as ignorant and prejudiced, and they were told: "Hear what the doctors say in favor of alcohol as both food and medicine."

Some of the doctors took it upon themselves to cover with abuse all those who favored abstinence, especially among their own number. Some regarded a physician as being unscientific if he did not order it. Some of us laymen remember well how heated some of the doctors became in their condemnation of the "fanatics," as they stigmatized those who urged abstinence.

Now a great change has come and it is indicated in such statements as the following:

Dr. Howard A. Kelley, of Johns Hopkins hospital, Baltimore, at the Washington meeting of the American Society for the Study of Alcohol and Other Drug Habits, speaking, "as a physician with 32 years' experience," said:

"I began my practise in private life by prescribing alcohol in its various forms as an easily diffusible stimulant in cases of periodic weakness, in low fevers, and exhaustion, in accordance with the common custom of a generation ago. . . . My experience has told me that the effect is temporary, evanescent; that the drug (for such it is) does no real good, and that a dangerous habit is thus easily endangered which may be most difficult to eradicate, a habit that may utterly ruin the patient's body, soul, and spirit."

Dr. W. H. Waugh, editor of Clinical Medicine, Chicago, said in a paper read at the same meeting: "Personally I stand ready to use alcohol any time when I believe it to be to the best interests of my patients, but I do not know a solitary use or a solitary case occurring in the widest range of medicine practise in which alcohol is the best remedy that can be applied."

Concerning the use of alcohol in pneumonia, Dr. A. A. Hill says: "I rely on digitalis, strychnine, careful feeding, and absolute rest, but always refuse at the critical period when the overburdened and dilated right heart has almost reached the breaking point, to help my patient over the precipice by prescribing the so-called stimulant that must often by its paralyzing effect on the cardiac nerves take away his last chance of recovery. 'Lobar pneumonia, cardiac failure'—so runs the usual certificate, and the cause of the cardiac failure in 95 cases out of 100, is alcohol."

Dr. Stille, a German health officer, replied recently to a brother practitioner who had said that an abstaining physician has no right to impose his views upon his patient and deny him alcoholic drinks, when he needs them to relieve depression. Dr. Stille said that only a very small part of the alcohol consumed can be said to afford pleasure in any true sense, and that is so infinitesimal compared with the misery it causes that he should consider himself inexcusable if he did not do all in his power to combat alcohol. He thinks that if any one is not convinced of the general injuriousness of alcohol it can only be because he has not made a sufficient study of the subject.

A book on "Vital Economy; or How to Conserve Your Strength," by John H. Clark, M. D., just ppublished in London (1909), contains this statement:

"The doctor is certainly responsible for a large share of the drinking customs of the present day. He gives indiscriminate or indefinite advice 'to take a little whisky with lunch and dinner,' or burgundy, or claret or port, as the case may be, and the patient is pretty certain to carry out the prescription—in all probability to the end of his days."

MEET IN CONGRESS AT ROME

International Gathering of Foes of Tuberculosis to Be Held Late in September.

Official announcement of the Seventh International Congress on Tuberculosis, which will include representatives from every civilized country in the world, has been made by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. The congress will be held in Rome from September 24 to 30, 1911, and will be similar in many respects to that held in Washington in the fall of 1908. The congress, which meets every three years, will be under the direct patronage of the king and queen of Italy.

An American committee of 100 will be appointed as the official representatives of the United States. Meanwhile the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis is acting in that capacity and its office in New York will be the headquarters for the United States delegation. The secretary general of the congress is Prof. Vittorio Ascoli of Rome.

As a direct result of the stimulus of the last international congress held in this country, the American committee will be able to report that the number of tuberculosis agencies in this country have been tripled in the three years. More than twice as much money is being spent in the fight against tuberculosis by private societies and institutions, and the appropriations of federal, state, municipal and county have increased nearly fourfold. It is estimated that nearly $15,000,000 will be spent in anti-tuberculosis work in 1910.

Confusing.

Craig Biddle, at a dinner in Newport, was describing the changing odds on the Jeffries-Johnson fight at Reno.

"Eight to four and a half on Jeffries—nine to six the other way about—three to one and a quarter—it's rather confusing, isn't it?" he said. "In fact, it's almost as confusing as the two girls' talk about a secret.

"'Mary,' said the first girl, 'told me that you had told her that secret I told you not to tell her.'

"'The nasty thing,' said the other girl. 'I told her not to tell you I told her.'

"'Well, said the first girl, 'I told her I wouldn't tell you she told me—so don't tell her I did.'"

Attention Sick Women

If you had positive proof that a certain remedy for female ills had made many remarkable cures, would you not feel like trying it?

If during the last thirty years we have not succeeded in convincing every fair-minded woman that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has cured thousands and thousands of women of the ills peculiar to their sex, then we long for an opportunity to do so by direct correspondence. Meanwhile read the following letters which we guarantee to be genuine and truthful.

Hudson, Ohio.—"I suffered for a long time from a weakness, inflammation, dreadful pains each month and suppression. I had been doctoring and receiving only temporary relief, when a friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I did so, and wrote to you for advice. I have faithfully followed your directions and now, after taking only five bottles of the Vegetable Compound, I have every reason to believe I am a well woman. I give you full permission to use my testimonial." —Mrs. Lena Carmocino, Hudson, Ohio. R. F. D. No. 7.

St. Regis Falls, N. Y.—"Two years ago I was so bad that I had to take to my bed every month, and it would last from two to three weeks. I wrote to you for advice and took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in dry form. I am happy to say that I am cured, thanks to your medicine and good advice. You may use my letter for the good of others." —Mrs. J. H. Breyere, St. Regis Falls, N. Y.

There is absolutely no doubt about the ability of this grand old remedy, made from the roots and herbs of our fields, to cure female diseases. We possess volumes of proof of this fact, enough to convince the most skeptical.

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No sick woman does justice to herself who will not try this famous medicine. Made exclusively from roots and herbs, and has thousands of cures to its credit.

Mrs. Pinkham invites all sick women to write her for advice. She has guided thousands to health free of charge. Address Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass.

PEOPLE'S PULPIT...

Sermon by CHARLES T. RUSSELL, Pastor Brooklyn Tabernacle

Blood Atonement For Sin Is a Necessity

"The life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Leviticus xvii, 11).

Brooklyn, N. Y., October 2.—Pastor Russell of the Brooklyn Tabernacle addressed a large and very attentive audience today at the Academy of Music from the above text. He said:—

Ours is a day in which, more than ever before, the statement of our text is disputed—disbelieved—by Jews, Gentiles and Christians. The great Christian author, St. Paul, agrees exactly with the words of Moses in our text, saying, "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins" (Hebrews ix, 22). The orthodox Jew and the orthodox Christian, therefore, are in substantial agreement as to the foundation of things and the unorthodox are in agreement of opposition. The latter agree that there is no necessity for Sin Atonement—that the later thought of all the wise men of the earth, the greatest ministers and rabbis, is that there is no such thing as Original Sin; hence could be no such thing as necessity for cancelling it—of making an atonement or satisfaction to Justice on behalf of it. Two things have contributed to these unorthodox, unscriptural views.

(1) The agnostic Jew not only disputes the Bible as an authority on the subject, but, in addition, admits to himself that if the shedding of blood, if the sacrifices commanded by the Levitical code for Sin Atonement be admitted to be right and necessary, it would involve the thought that the Jewish people have had no Sin Atonement in any sense of the word for more than eighteen centuries, because Sin Atonement must be made according to certain specified conditions or else it could not be made at all. The loss of the Ark of the Covenant containing the Law, and covered by the mercy-seat, was one of these disasters. The destruction of Jerusalem, the City of the great King, was another, and, above all, the Law required that the sacrifices should be killed, and the presentations sacrificially made to God, only by a priest who could show his lineage as a son of Aaron.

(2) Since the destruction of Jerusalem A. D. 70, the Jewish nation has been scattered and devastated by their foes [illegible] of these, alas, claiming to be [illegible]tians and dishonoring the name of Jesus! As a result all official records and genealogies of the Jewish people are broken, vitiated, destroyed. Undoubtedly there are numerous descendants from Aaron living today; but, since they cannot prove their descent, they are absolutely forbidden to attempt to make a Sin Atonement on the Atonement Day. Viewing the matter from this standpoint the unorthodox Jew feels all the more inclined to repudiate the necessity for any Sin Atonement. Alas, indeed, many of them seem not only to have lost confidence in the Mosaic arrangement, but to have lost faith entirely in a personal God. We hope and believe that many of these are sincere and will be blessed and assisted back to faith shortly and to a better understanding of the holy Scriptures and of God's dealings with their nation.

Jewish Atonement a Farce.

In view of what we have said, all must see that it would be impossible for the Jews properly to observe the Atonement Day, having no priest nor other facility necessary to the requirements of the Law. Nevertheless, an outward show of ceremony is kept up. On the proper Atonement Day of their year, the Tenth Day of the Seventh Month, the Jew figuratively acknowledges that the merit of the previous sacrifice has expired. He fasts. He prays, according to the original program. But he has no priest. No bullock is slain for the sins of the tribe of Levi. No goat is slain for the sins of the other tribes. And no blood is taken into the Most Holy to make an Atonement. Not only have they no priest to officiate, but they have no mercy-seat. Some of them wring the neck of a rooster, swinging it over the head three times. But this was not the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement and could not take its place.

We should not be misunderstood as holding up the Jew to ridicule. Quite to the contrary, we sympathize with him. We appreciate his reverence for the Divine Law and his desire for fellowship with God in the cleansing of his sins. We would, however, suggest to them that nothing is to be gained by deceiving themselves and each other into the supposition that their Atonement Day brings them any relief or harmonizes them in any sense of the word with the Almighty. What they do is a mere farce. The sooner this be acknowledged the sooner will their honesty in the matter bring them into the proper condition of heart to recognize that the sins of more than eighteen centuries rest upon them uncancelled and that this is the explanation of the calamities that have befallen them.

When Israelites come properly to understand the situation, they will see that all their hopes center in Messiah's Kingdom. Messiah is not only the great King typified by David and Solomon, but he is also the great Priest typified by Aaron and more particularly by Melchisedec, who was a priest upon his kingly throne. So Messiah will not only be the great King over Israel and the world, but he will be the great Priest whose application of his own merit will effect the cancellation of sins forever. He will not re-introduce to them sacrifices of bulls and goats, but will make known to them that those sacrifices were mere foreshadowings of better sacrifices—so much better that they will not need repeating yearly, but work a perpetual cancellation of the sins of Israel and of all the children of Adam.

Higher Critics Repudiate the Blood.

All the worldly-wise of Christendom have reached the point of repudiating the testimony of the Old Testament and the New respecting the need of a sacrificial death for the satisfaction of Divine Justice, the cancellation of sin and the restitution of the sinner to Divine favor. The claim of the so-called New Theologists repudiates the fall, repudiates the ransom and repudiates a restitution to all that was lost—claiming that nothing was lost and that all we have is gain. Thus the world and its wisdom know not God and appreciate not his arrangement that, as death came upon mankind through the sin of one man (Adam), even so a restitution to life should come to all men through Christ—that "as all in Adam die, even so all in Christ shall be made alive."

These worldly-wise cannot deny the fact that there is sin in the world and that there is death in the world and that the tendency of all sin is towards death. They cannot deny that death is gaining a greater hold than ever before upon our race. Insane asylums, prisons and reform schools show that, notwithstanding our educational facilities and wonderful achievements under the enlightening influences of the New Dispensation now dawning—nevertheless, the insanity statistics and the prison statistics and the physical statistics show that, in spite of everything, our race is becoming mentally, morally and physically weaker day by day. It is for them to explain how these facts fit to their theory of Evolution.

The Christian's View of Sin Atonement.

By the term Christian we refer to those who intelligently believe the explanation of the Bible respecting sin, that it is a violation of the Divine Law and carries with it a penalty—that Father Adam was created as sinless as are the angels and as perfect as they, only on a little lower plane of being. Obedience was required of him as the price of Divine favor and everlasting life. Disobedience thrust him from Paradise into the unprepared earth to wrestle with the thorns and thistles, where the decree, "Dying thou shalt die," accomplished his execution. His race was in his loins and naturally shared by heredity his weaknesses and death penalty, so that the entire race is a dying race. But the Creator was unwilling that Adam and his children should die as brutes. God did not revoke his decree of death nor give any intimation that he had done unjustly in condemning his creature. He did, however, provide a way for their relief. He provided that, as the first man alone had sinned actually, so one Redeemer alone would be necessary for the race. And to him he offered a great reward, so that his sacrifice for sins would work out to his own advantage, as well as to the sinner's. A part of the reward was the high exaltation to the heavenly nature—far above angels, and the gift of the Kingdom of earth necessary for the overruling and subduing of the spirit of rebellion in the world and for the exaltation and uplifting from sin and death conditions of all the willing and obedient of Adam's entire race.

"The Better Sacrifices."

From the Divine standpoint "the man Christ Jesus gave himself a ransom for all," for Adam's entire race, to be testified in due time. He antityped the bullock of Israel's Atonement Day, as well as antityped the priest who slew the bullock—because he offered up himself. Rewarded by the Almighty, he was raised from death to the spirit plane, higher than the angels. Applying his merit to the antitypical Levites, "the household of faith," "the Church of the Firstborns," he then began a work little understood by either Jews or Christians, but nevertheless clearly outlined in the Word of God. His work throughout this age has been the gathering of the elect class—which is chosen because of faithfulness to him and obedience in walking in his steps in the narrow way. These, composed both of Jews and of Gentiles, have for centuries been in course of development—their sacrifices being typified by that of the Lord's goat on the Atonement Day. Their sacrifices are small and lean like that of the goat, in comparison to the bullock. But they are accepted by the Great High Priest, and the offering of their sacrifice is counted as his sacrifice. Thus eventually the High Priest will complete his work of sin-atonement (we believe very soon) and then his second application of the blood upon the Mercy-Seat will be made, just as it was written in the Law, "On behalf of all the people," only that "all the people" on the larger scale will not mean merely the Israelites outside of the Levites, but will mean the whole world of mankind outside of the household of faith, the antitypical Levites. Forthwith the whole world will be turned over to Messiah, the antitypical Prophet, Priest, King, Mediator, Judge. Then for a thousand years the world will receive the blessed, uplifting influences.

There will come in Israel's share in the great work of recovering the world to God. They are still beloved for the fathers' sakes and the gifts and calling of God to them are things he will not repent of. At that time the great antitypical Prophet, Priest and King will begin his work as a Mediator. At that time he will mediate by bringing into operation the New Covenant which God promised he would make with Israel and Judah, "after those days"—after the days of their humiliation and being cast off; they shall be reclaimed and uplifted and blessed and used of the Lord. This is God's Covenant with them when he will take away their sins—when by virtue of the "better sacrifices" their sins shall be absolutely and forever cancelled by the antitypical Priest, of whom the Prophet David wrote, "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for the age after the order of Melchizedek"—a kingly priest on the spirit plane (Psalm cx, 4).

What Atonement Signifies.

The word Atonement or At-one-ment signifies the bringing of persons alienated or estranged back into harmony, sympathy, union. Many are perplexed at the doctrine of blood-atonement so prominently set forth in the Bible. The shedding of blood is naturally revolting and properly so. It seems strange, therefore, to those who do not understand the philosophy of the Divine Plan of Salvation, why God should have required a blood-atonement for sin. Sometimes the very people who object to blood-atonement believe something much more awful—that an atonement for sin can be effected by hundreds or thousands of years of most terrible torture. Some believe even worse than this—that an everlasting torment penalty for sin will be exacted of all except the saintly few of humanity. How inconsistent and illogical we have all been in our reasoning upon religious subjects!

In Scriptural usage blood stands for, or represents, the life. In harmony with this is our ordinary use of the word. We read, "The blood of Jesus Christ our Lord cleanseth us from all sin." Here the word blood stands for death, or rather, for the merit of the sacrificial death of Jesus. His death would have been equally efficacious as man's Ransom-Price if his side had not been pierced. It would have been equally meritorious if he had died in any other manner, except that he was to take the place of the sinner to the very last degree—as the Mosaic Law declares, "Cursed is everyone that hangeth upon a tree," thus branding crucifixion as the most ignominious form of death.

But why should God require the death of a victim as a basis for the forgiveness of the sins of Adam and his race? We reply that God's Law was intended to be an illustration of the exactness of Divine Justice. Justice could not punish Adam nor his children with everlasting torture or any other of the horrible things we once imagined. The severest penalty of the Divine Law is represented in our common law, which, as an extreme penalty, requires the death of the transgressor. Adam, having been sentenced to death, would have had no future opportunity for life—neither by resurrection nor otherwise. Adam's children, sharing his weaknesses, would have had no opportunity to regain life, because justice is unchangeable. If it was just to condemn sin, it would be injustice to rescind the penalty and set the culprit free. Divine Love has provided a way by which Adam and his children are all to be freed from death and have an opportunity of eternal life—not by violating the requirements of Divine Justice, but by fulfilling them. Hence in due time, the man Christ Jesus died for the man Adam, to cancel his sin, to satisfy his penalty. And since his sin and penalty have been inherited by his children, the one sacrifice for sin is sufficient for all.

The work of atonement is not completed. The first half of atonement is the satisfaction of Justice. But even this part is not yet completed. The Redeemer presents his sacrifice in two parts, according to the type. The first effusion of his blood spoke peace to believers who now have the ears to hear and the heart to obey; the second effusion, as shown by the Law (Leviticus xvi, 15), will make reconciliation for the sins of all the people—the whole world of mankind. Then the other part of Atonement begins.

After the Divine reconciliation comes human reconciliation. The great Messiah will not require sacrifices of humanity, but, on the contrary, will open the blind eyes and cause the knowledge of the grace of God to reach Adam and every member of his race. Then all willing for reconciliation will be helped by the great Mediator of the New Covenant and by Israel, his Chosen People and earthly representatives. The object to be accomplished during Messiah's reign is the bringing to all the willing and obedient the restitution which God has promised—restitution to all that was lost. Ultimately Messiah will transfer the allegiance of the whole world (perfected by him) to Jehovah God, that he may be all in all (I Corinthians xv, 28).

OF
Valuable Coal
AND
OTHER PROPERTY
Situate in Garrett County, Md.,
Known as the Gillespie Property.

By virtue of the authority vested in the undersigned Trustee, by decree entered on the 26th day of May, 1910, in the matter of C. D. Gillespie, bankrupt, pending in the District Court of the United State for the Northern District of West Virginia, the undersigned Trustee will, on

SATURDAY,

the 23rd Day of July, 1910,

at Eleven O'clock A. M.,

at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, the following real estate, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, owned by C. D. Gillespie.

I

All the coal and the right to mine and remove the same, underlying

315 Acres of Land.

being part of a tract known as "Elk Garden," situate in Garrett county, Maryland, together with 100 acres of the surface of said 315 acres and all the rights and privileges granted to the said C. D. Gillespie in connection with said coal property. Two-thirds of said property was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Ada A. V. Halterman, by deed dated the 6th day of June, 1904, of record in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 45, folio 152, and the remaining one-third was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Austin Brown, Sheriff, by deed bearing date December 1, 1909, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 435, to which deeds reference is now here had for a more particular description of said property.

This property is situated very near the Western Maryland Railroad, near the station of Henry on said railroad and adjacent to the coal property now being operated by the Davis Coal & Coke Company at its mines at Henry. The coal underlying this property which is to be sold is very valuable.

II

All of the coal underlying a tract of land containing

68 1-2 Acres,

situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being known as a part of the "Elk Garden" tract and being the same coal conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Peter F. Snyder and wife, by deed bearing date October 27, 1905, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 364, to which deed reference is here had for a particular description of said 68½ acres, together with all the rights and privileges as to mining rights, surface and rights of way, as were vested in said Gillespie by said deed.

This 68½ acres of coal is considered very valuable. It is located a distance of about three or four miles from the railroad.

III

An undivided one half interest in ten acres of land, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being also a part of what is known as the "Elk Garden" tract, said undivided one-half interest having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry F. Marshall and wife, by deed dated the 11th day of August 1902, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 42, folio 300, to which deed reference is had for a particular description of said property.

IV

A tract or parcel of land containing one acre, more or less, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Gorman, having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry C. Stemple and wife, by deed dated the 30th day of April, 1907, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 54, folio 454. There are situated, on this property, several buildings, one of which can be used for a combination dwelling house and store building.

All of the above described property will be sold free and acquit from all liens and incumbrances. The title to all of said property is considered good.

TERMS OF SALE.—One-third cash in hand on day of sale and the residue upon a credit of six and twelve months, the purchaser to give interest bearing notes, with good personal security, for the deferred purchase money and the legal title to the property to be retained as additional security, until said deferred purchase money has been paid.

C. W. MAXWELL, Trustee.

The above sale is continued until

Thursday, October 20th,

at 2 o'clock P. M., at the same place.

This property will positively be sold at the time and place mentioned.

ORDER NISI.

LEG BROKEN BY RUNAWAY.

Alfred Broadwater Dragged Four Hundred Yards Under Overturned Wagon.

Last Thursday Mr. Alfred Broadwater, who resides in this county just west of Lonaconing, had a remarkable escape from a horrible death, but as it transpired he got off with a broken leg and dislocated shoulder and a number of severe bruises.

Mr. Broadwater was driving along the road when he lost control of his team of young colts and they ran away. The wagon was overturned, throwing Mr. Broadwater beneath it and in this position he was dragged over the stony road for a distance of possibly four hundred yards. He was wedged under the body of the vehicle in such a position that he was unable to either extricate or help himself in any particular. The horses eventually stopped and Mr. Broadwater was rescued from his perilous position by a number of men who were passing at the time and who took the man home where he was attended by a physician.

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES TAKE A FIRM STAND

Principles Upon Which Nominees for Congress Appeal to Voters.

The six Republican candidates for Congress in Maryland have issued the platform upon which they will appeal to voters at the coming election. It is a strong document and clearly defines Republican ideas on questions of the day.

At the outstart the several candidates pledge themselves, if elected, "to aid the President in securing a complete fulfillment of every promise expressed and implied, in our last national platform."

The candidates also declare themselves in favor of the following issues:

Conservation of our national resources.

Effective federal supervision of interstate and foreign commerce.

Revision of the tariff in accordance with recommendations by a permanent tariff commission.

Highest integrity in public life.

A reference to state issues is contained in the following closing sentence of the platform:

"The unfortunate plight of some of our cities and states where exist bribery and corruption, governmental inefficiency in public affairs, attempts to override governmental law, extravagance and increasing taxes, stand out in bold contrast to that high standard of civic righteousness for which all right thinking men are today earnestly striving."

The platform in detail follows:

The Republican candidates for representatives from Maryland in the Sixty-second Congress of the United States reaffirm their loyalty to the principles of the Republican party embodied in its platform of 1908, and indorsed by the people in the election of President Taft and if elected we pledge our effort in the coming Congress to aid our President in securing a complete fulfillment of every promise, expressed or implied, in our last national platform.

"We favor the conservation of our natural resources for development under such regulations and by such means as may best assure the use of the country's wealth for the country's good.

"We favor the effective supervision by the federal government of interstate and foreign commerce as a safeguard against the dangers of monopoly and to protect the commercial liberties of the people, thus preserving their commercial equalty.

"The new tariff law was enacted without upsetting business. Rates of duty on some articles of luxury were increased and on common food products and necessities of life were either unchanged or decreased; notwithstanding a general average reduction of 11 per cent. in all duties, it resulted in converting a deficit into a surplus, and, unlike the last Democratic tariff law, which blasted industry, closed mills and factories and threw thousands of wage earners out of employment, the new law has given renewed impetus to industry, employment to labor at remunerative wages, and to the agriculturist the greatest prosperity known in years.

"We heartily approve the wise and far-seeing decision of this administration that, in amending our tariff law hereafter the attention of the Congress and of public opinion shall be concentrated upon one schedule at one time, and that all changes shall be made in the light of trustworthy information furnished by a permanent and disinterested commission of public experts, and we applaud the energy and persistency of President Taft in seeking, and his success in securing appropriate legislation to give practical effect to this salutary determination.

"We are in hearty sympathy with the great moral awakening of the people, under the inspiring leadership of men like William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt and Charles E. Hughes in demanding the very highest integrity in public life as being essential to the perpetuity of the liberties of the people. We insist upon the high standard of official conduct as vital to the welfare of our own state, as well as the nation.

"The unfortunate plight of some of our cities and state where exist bribery and corruption, govermental inefficiency in public affairs, attempts to over-ride organic law, extravagence and increasing taxes stand out in bold contrast to that high standard of civic righteousness for which all right-thinking men are today earnestly striving.

Obituary.

On Oct. 1, 1910, Mr. Solomon Hogue, Sr., passed away, aged 73 years, 6 months and 27 days. He was a native of Pennsylvania, but removed to Garrett county about 27 years ago. Dec. 27, 1860, he was married to Miss Emmeline Yoder, who survives him. To this union were born eleven children of whom ten are yet living. He also leaves quite a number of relatives and a host of friends. He was quiet and unobtrusive in his manner and always sought to be fair and honest with everyone. He became a christian when a young man and for over fifty years he served God. For about twenty-five years of that time he held the office of deacon in the Deep Creek Baptist church located at Thayerville in this county. As long as his health permitted he attended on his Master's work and made himself useful in extending His kingdom. He will be sorely missed by the community in which he lived and by his church, yet in the midst of our sorrow we should not grieve unduly, for he suffered much and is now free from suffering, being present with the Lord. Our eyes will not again be gladdened by beholding his face here upon earth but we believe the time is coming when we shall again clasp hands in loving greeting.

We sympathize deeply with those who were near and dear to him, but to him we say: "Sleep on now and take your rest."

C. W. HUDSON, Pastor.

BITTINGER.

Mr. and Mrs. Oliver C. Buckel are rejoicing over the arrival of a young son in their home on Wednesday evening of last week.

Miss Emma Sharpless, of Chaffee, W. Va., is visiting at the home of John H. Stark at this place this week.

Earl Stanton and family, of Grantsville, spent last Sunday with relatives in this village.

Jonas Platter, of Keyser Ridge, was purchasing cattle in this neighborhood last week.

Miss Laura Kamp is employed in the home of Henry Wiley at this place.

A. J. Oester made a business trip to the county seat the early part of this week.

A large number of persons attended the communion services at the Glades Mennonite church on last Sunday morning.

Albert Bittinger, of Crellin, passed through this village last Monday morning.

Jonathan Broadwater, of Minnesota, was visiting in this vicinity last week.

POLITICIANS CLAIMS

Concerning Complexion of the Next House.

The political complexion of the next House of Representatives is a matter of much conjecture nowadays. According to the Republican leaders "the enthusiasm of the Democrats which led them to claim the next House by majorities which ranged from 25 to 100, has run its natural course. The Democratic party for the past 25 years always carried this country about the middle of August. But unhappily for the party, the elections are not held in August, but on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, and Democratic victory recedes with even greater haste than do the days following each other from tha middle of August to election day in November. The Democrats always carry the country in August. The Republicans always carry it in November. Therin lies the difference."

Colonel Roosevelt will shortly issue a statement calling upon Republicans everywhere to eschew qualifying adjectives and to vote the ticket.

The Democratic campaign in New York, it is said by men who are in touch with the New York situation, will be made wholly upon the issue of Roosevelt and the outcome will determine, they think, Roosevelt's political future. If, under the circumstances, he can elect the Republican ticket this year it will firmly intrench him as the Republican boss of the State and will mean that the 72 votes of New York in the Republican National Convention of 1912 will be his to do with as he pleases.

That the New York delegation in almost any convention would come pretty close to holding the balance of power is conceded. Hence, it is claimed, if Roosevelt wins his fight this fall, it will be wholly in his power to bring about his nomination two years hence.

FRIENDSVILLE.

Last week we had a day's rain. We could do with a few more. It was not enough to help the wells and springs.

Mrs. Amos Severe has been spending several days with her parents here.

Frank Davis has finished sawing at his present location. The mill will be moved to Reason Run.

Harvey Bittinger and family are moving away from our city to locate at Somerfield, Pa.

F. G. Fox is busy getting his hotel into good shape. Rooms are being painted and papered, ditches dug, and drains opened. He intends to keep at it until he has a first class hotel in every respect.

Several car loads of sheep were driven into town and shipped away the latter part of the week.

George F. Frazee is doing as well as can be expected and is improving. We hope he may soon recover entirely.

J. G. Kolb was down to Somerfield and vicinity the greater part of the past week, attending to his coal interests.

Miss Margaret Snyder did not return to her school room on Monday, she being sick at home, and Miss Ethel Greenwood from the high school filled her position.

W. F. East and son have completed a very fine job of painting on Harry Rumbaugh's large new residence a short distance from town.

Rubin Steele, Ernest and Milton Kamp and Arnold Fox drove to Addison on Sunday. The young ladies over there will have to watch their hearts when this quartette are traveling.

Miss Nora Brown left last week for a visit to her sister, Mrs. Dr. Rees, at Hyndman, Pa., returning on Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. George Dunham have been visiting friends at Addison.

Milton J. Forsythe has been rural free delivery carrier for a few days.

Clinton Ringer is the proud father of a fine baby boy that arrived Monday afternoon.

Charles Cummings was a visitor here Monday, he returned to Accident in the evening.

Mrs. John Haney was a visitor at her parents Mr. and Mrs. William Frederick, Sr.

Henry Shevel and family drove to Cove on Sunday to visit his parents.

It is up to some of our business men to go and see the business people of Accident and put before them the advantages of a good road to Friendsville. The road contemplated would be a water grade and they surely must grasp the benefit to be derived from such a one.

Urbin Ross has accepted a position as clerk at the Crawford Hotel.

GOOD ROADS WANTED BY GARRETT COUNTIANS.

Meeting Held at Pope's School House and Resolutions Adopted.

A number of Frostburgers accepted an invitation to attend the Garrett county meeting at Pope's school house Tuesday afternoon.

The statement has been made that of $228,000 allotted to Garrett county by the State, $150,000 had been spent—all in the vicinity of Oakland on county—not state roads, and upon this the addresses were generally predicated.

Thomas Layman called the meeting to order; H. S. Coleman was elected chairman and Thomas J. Johnson secretary.

G. Clinton Uhl, of Mt. Savage, a Road Director of this county, first called upon, very properly disclaiming his presence as an interference with Garrett county affairs, gave some instructive hints as to re-building the Pike cheaply.

Otho S. Fike, county commissioner, was no less entertaining.

Brief but strong addresses by Thomas J. Johnson, Thomas Layman, Dr. T. Griffith, W. E. G. Hitchins, Frank Watts, Peter Lammert and others followed.

The result was the appointment of a Committee on Resolations — Messrs. Thomas Layman, David Pope, B. F. Michael, James Carey, F. C. Graham, Otho S. Fike, and Thomas J. Johnson.

The following hastily written, were then unanimously adopted.

RESOLVED, That the Governor and the State Road Commission be urged to withold all further appropriations for improvement of roads in Garrett county until the necessary reconstruction of the National Pike be completed as contemplated, we believe, by the law, originally and popularly understood as providing first, for the improvement of through highways.

RESOLVED, That the State Roads Commission be requested to solicit bids for the reconstrnction of not less than five miles of continuous road westward on National Pike, beginning at the Allegany Garrett line.

RESOLVED, further, That this meeting learns that six miles of road near Oakland has been completed, six miles under construction, and a request is pending for six miles more—eighteen miles in all, a concentration of State money in one section which we feel is unfair and unjust to the people of this county.

Messrs. D. M. Dixon and Otho S. Fike—county commissioners, C. J. Hershberger, U. M. Stanton, and Thomas J. Johnson were later appointed a committee to convey resolutions to the Governor and State Roads Commission.—Frostburg Mining Journal.

B. & O. IMPROVEMENTS

Water Being Pumped and Hauled From Deer Park.

Some of the gentlemen composing the delegation of business men who called upon President Willard, of the Baltimore and Ohio last spring urging additional movement of increasing freight have recently expressed themselves as gratified with the work of development now going on between Grafton, W. Va., and Cumberland, Md. Sprigg Camden, of Parkersburg, W. Va., was at Deer Park a few days ago on the way to Baltimore for a conference with Mr. Willard. He is very much pleased.

Day and night, regardless of the day of the week or weather conditions the task of laying a third track on the side of the mountain on the 17-mile grade, has been going on all summer, and considering that this is a work of great magnitude, extraordinary progress has been made. The business of the company at present is so extensive that a fourth track on the grade in question from Altamont, three miles from Deer Park, down to Piedmont, could be easily utilized. Never in the history of the company has there been such a steadily increasing volume of freight, particularly of coal, passing eastward. New engines and new equipment in the shape of steel freight cars, are being received and at once placed in action, and yet there is need for more.

On the slight grade from Deer Park to Altamont, two big engines are needed to move freight, and with in addition, a big helper engine pushing behind. This movement of traffic goes on steadily day and night, and Sundays. With all this business the drouth of the late summer has necessitated the hauling of water a long distance, ponderous oil tank trains being used to carry water for steam making purposes. "Carrying coals to Newcastle," is exemplified in hauling water to points on the line of road close to the Cheat River in West Virginia, the explanation being that the water of Cheat River is not at all suitable for the making of steam in engines. To help matters somewhat in this direction, a large force was engaged on Sunday in laying a spur track at Deer Park to the Little Yough River so that water can be pumped into the tank cars direct from the stream.

OCTOBER WEATHER.

Hicks Predicts Numerous Storms, With Killing Frosts.

If the predictions of Prof. Hicks, the St. Louis weather prophet, are to be fulfilled, October will surely be a stormy month. Hicks says the autumnal equinox will bring heavy rains, accompanied by severe thunder and lightning. As the months grows the temperature will lower and killing frosts will prevail, and that sleet and snow squalls will occur.

THE CIRCULAR STAIRCASE

SYNOPSIS.

Miss Innes, spinster and guardian of Gertrude and Halsey, established summer headquarters at Sunnyside. The servants desert. Gertrude and Halsey arrive with Jack Bailey. The house was awakened by a revolver shot and Arnold Armstrong was found shot to death in the hall. Miss Innes found Halsey's revolver on the lawn. He and Jack Bailey had disappeared. Gertrude revealed that she was engaged to Jack Bailey, with whom she talked in the billiard room shortly before the murder. Detective Jamieson accused Miss Innes of holding back evidence. He imprisoned an intruder in an empty room. The prisoner escaped. Gertrude was suspected because of an injured foot. Halsey reappears and says he and Bailey were called away by a telegram. Cashier Bailey of Paul Armstrong's bank, defunct, was arrested for embezzlement. Paul Armstrong's death was announced. Halsey's fiancee, Louise Armstrong, told Halsey that while she still loved him, she was to marry another. It developed that Dr. Walker was the man. Louise was found at the bottom of the circular staircase. Recovering consciousness, she said something had brushed by her on the stairway and she fainted. Bailey is suspected of Armstrong's murder. After "seeing a ghost," Thomas, the lodgekeeper, was found dead with a slip in his pocket bearing the name of "Lucien Wallace." Dr. Walker asked Miss Innes to vacate in favor of Mrs. Armstrong. She refused. A note from Bailey to Gertrude arranging a meeting at night was found. A ladder out of place opens the mystery. The stables were burned. During the excitement a man stole into the house. A search failed to reveal him. Miss Innes shot an intruder. A man limping was seen on the road.

CHAPTER XXIV—Continued.

"Did they go toward the club?" Gertrude asked suddenly, leaning forward.

"No, miss. I think they came into the village. I didn't get a look at their faces, but I know every chick and child in the place, and everybody knows me. When they didn't shout at me—in my uniform, you know—I took it they were strangers."

So all we had for our afternoon's work was this: Some one had been shot by the bullet that went through the door; he had not left the village, and he had not called in a physician. Also, Dr. Walker knew who Lucien Wallace was, and his very denial made me confident that, in that one direction at least, we were on the right track.

"Gertrude," I said, "I have been a very selfish old woman. You are going to leave this miserable house tonight. Annie Morton is going to Scotland next week, and you shall go right with her."

To my surprise, she flushed painfully.

"I don't want to go, Aunt Ray," she said. "Don't make me leave now."

"You are losing your health and your good looks," I said decidedly. "You should have a change."

"I shan't stir a foot." She was equally decided. Then, more lightly: "Why, you and Liddy need me to arbitrate between you every day in the week."

Perhaps I was growing suspicious of every one, but it seemed to me that Gertrude's gayety was forced and artificial. I watched her covertly during the rest of the drive, and I did not like the two spots of crimson in her pale cheeks. But I said nothing more about sending her to Scotland; I knew she would not go.

CHAPTER XXV.

A Visit from Louise.

That day was destined to be an eventful one, for when I entered the house and found Eliza ensconsed in the upper hall on a chair, with Mary Anne doing her best to stifle her with household ammonia, and Liddy rubbing her wrists—whatever good that is supposed to do—I knew that the ghost had been walking again, and this time in daylight.

Eliza was in a frenzy of fear. She clutched at my sleeve when I went close to her, and refused to let go until she had told her story. Coming just after the fire, the household was demoralized, and it was no surprise to me to find Alex and the undergardener struggling downstairs with a heavy trunk between them.

"I didn't want to do it, Miss Innes," Alex said. "But she was so excited I was afraid she would do as she said—drag it down herself, and scratch the staircase."

I was trying to get my bonnet off and to keep the maids quiet at the same time. "Now, Eliza, when you have washed your face and stopped bawling," I said, "come into my sitting room and tell me what has happened."

Liddy put away my things without speaking. The very set of her shoulders expressed disapproval.

"Well," I said, when the silence became uncomfortable, "things seem to be warming up."

Silence from Liddy, and a long sigh.

"If Eliza goes, I don't know where to look for another cook." More silence.

"Rosie is probably a good cook." Sniff.

"Liddy," I said at last, "don't dare to deny that you are having the time of your life. You positively gloat in this excitement. You never looked better. It's my opinion all this running around, and getting jolted out of a rut, has stirred up that torpid liver of yours."

"It's not myself I'm thinking about," she said, goaded into speech. "Maybe my liver was torpid, and maybe it wasn't; but I know this: I've got some feelings left, and to see you standing at the foot of that staircase shootin' through the door—I'll never be the same woman again."

"Well, I'm glad of that—anything for a change," I said. And in came Eliza, flanked by Rosie and Mary Anne.

Her story, broken with sobs and corrections from the other two, was this: At two o'clock (2:15, Rosie insisted) she had gone upstairs to get a picture from her room to show Mary Anne. (A picture of a lady, Mary Anne interposed.) She went up the servants' staircase and along the corridor to her room, which lay between the trunkroom and the unfinished ballroom. She heard a sound as she went down the corridor like some one moving furniture, but she was not nervous. She thought it might be men examining the house after the fire the night before, but she looked in the trunkroom and saw nobody.

She went into her room quietly. The noise had ceased and everything was quiet. Then she sat down on the side of her bed, and, feeling faint—she was subject to spells—("I told you that when I came, didn't I, Rosie?" "Yes'm, indeed she did!")—she put her head down on her pillow and—

Struggling Down-Stairs with a Heavy Trunk.

"Took a nap. All right!" I said. "Go on."

"When I came to, Miss Innes, sure as I'm sittin' here, I thought I'd die. Somethin' hit me in the face, and I set up, sudden. And then I seen the plaster drop, droppin' from a little hole in the wall. And the first thing I knew, an iron bar that long (fully two yards by her measure) "shot through that hole and tumbled on the bed. If I'd been still sleeping" ("Fainting," corrected Rosie) "I'd 'a' been hit on the head and killed!"

"I wisht you'd heard her scream," put in Mary Anne. "And her face as white as a pillow-slip when she tumbled down the stairs."

"No doubt there is some natural explanation for it, Eliza," I said. "You may have dreamed it, in your 'fainting' attack. But if it is true, the metal rod and the hole in the wall will show it."

Eliza looked a little bit sheepish.

"The hole's there all right, Miss Innes," she said. "But the bar was gone when Mary Anne and Rosie went up to pack my trunk."

"That wasn't all," Liddy's voice came funereally from a corner. "Eliza said that from the hole in the wall a burning eye looked down at her!"

"The wall must be at least six inches thick," I said with asperity. "Unless the person who drilled the hole carried his eyes on the ends of a stick, Eliza couldn't possibly have seen them."

But the fact remained, and a visit to Eliza's room proved it. I might jeer all I wished; some one had drilled a hole in the unfinished wall of the ballroom, passing between the bricks of the partition, and shooting through the unresisting plaster of Eliza's room with such force as to send the rod flying on to her bed. I had gone upstairs alone, and I confess the thing puzzled me; in two or three places in the wall small apertures had been made, none of them of any depth. Not the least mysterious thing was the disappearance of the iron implement that had been used.

Mary Anne and Eliza left that afternoon, but Rosie decided to stay. It was about five o'clock when the hack came from the station to get them, and, to my amazement, it had an occupant. Matthew Geist, the driver, asked for me, and explained his errand with pride.

"I've brought you a cook, Miss Inness," he said. "When the message came to come up for two girls and their trunks I supposed there was something doing, and as this here woman had been looking for work in the village I thought I'd bring her along."

Already I had acquired the true suburbanite ability to take servants on faith; I no longer demanded written and unimpeachable references. I, Rachel Innes, have learned not to mind if the cook sits down comfortably in my sitting room when she is taking the orders for the day, and I am grateful if the silver is not cleaned with scouring soap. And so that day I merely told Liddy to send the new applicant in. When she came, however, I could hardly restrain a gasp of surprise. It was the woman with the pitted face.

She stood somewhat awkwardly just inside the door, and she had an air of self-confidence that was inspiring. Yes, she could cook; was not a fancy cook, but could make good soups and desserts if there was any one to take charge of the salads. And so, in the end, I took her. As Halsey said, when we told him, it didn't matter much about the cook's face if it was clean.

I have spoken of Halsey's restlessness. On that day it seemed to be more than ever a resistless impulse that kept him out until after luncheon. I think he hoped constantly that he might meet Louise driving over the hills in her runabout; possibly he did meet her occasionally, but from his continued gloom I felt sure the situation between them was unchanged.

Part of the afternoon I believe he read—Gertrude and I were out, as I have said, and at dinner we both noticed that something had occurred to distract him. He was disagreeable, which is unlike him, nervous, looking at his watch every few minutes, and he ate almost nothing. He asked twice during the meal on what train Mr. Jamieson and the other detective were coming, and had long periods of abstraction during which he dug his fork into my damask cloth and did not hear when he was spoken to. He refused dessert, and left the table early, excusing himself on the ground that he wanted to see Alex.

Alex, however, was not to be found. It was after eight when Halsey ordered the car and started down the hill at a pace that, even for him, was unusually reckless. Shortly after Alex reported that he was ready to go over the house preparatory to closing it for the night. Sam Bohannon came at a quarter before nine and began his patrol of the grounds, and with the arrival of the two detectives to look forward to I was not especially apprehensive.

At half-past nine I heard the sound of a horse driven furiously up the drive. It came to a stop in front of the house and immediately after there were hurried steps on the veranda. Our nerves were not what they should have been, and Gertrude, always apprehensive lately, was at the door almost instantly. A moment later Louise had burst into the room and stood there bareheaded and breathing hard.

"Where is Halsey?" she demanded. Above her plain black gown her eyes looked big and somber, and the rapid drive had brought no color to her face. I got up and drew forward a chair.

"He has not come back," I said quietly. "Sit down, child; you are not strong enough for this kind of thing."

I don't think she even heard me.

"He has not come back?" she asked, looking from me to Gertrude. "Do you know where he went? Where can I find him?"

"For heaven's sake, Louise," Gertrude burst out, "tell us what is wrong. Halsey is not here. He has gone to the station for Mr. Jamieson. What has happened?"

"To the station, Gertrude? You are sure?"

"Yes," I said. "Listen. There is the whistle of the train now."

She relaxed a little at our matter-of-fact tone, and allowed herself to sink into a chair.

"Perhaps I was wrong," she said heavily. "He—will be here in a few moments if—everything is right."

We sat there, the three of us, without attempt at conversation. Both Gertrude and I recognized the futility of asking Louise any questions; her reticence was a part of a role she had assumed. Our ears were strained for the first throb of the motor as it turned into the drive and commenced the climb to the house. Ten minutes passed, 15, 20. I saw Louise's hands grow rigid as they clutched the arms of her chair. I watched Gertrude's bright color slowly ebbing away, and around my own heart I seemed to feel the grasp of a giant hand.

Twenty-five minutes, and then a sound. But it was not the chug of the motor; it was the unmistakable rumble of the Casanova hack. Gertrude drew aside the curtain and peered into the darkness.

"It's the hack, I am sure," she said, evidently relieved. "Something has gone wrong with the car, and no wonder—the way Halsey went down the hill."

It seemed a long time before the creaking vehicle came to a stop at the door. Louise rose and stood watching, her hand to her throat. And then Gertrude opened the door, admitting Mr. Jamieson and a stocky, middle-aged man. Halsey was not with them. When the door had closed and Louise realized that Halsey had not come, her expression changed. From tense watchfulness to relief, and now again to absolute despair, her face was an open page.

"Halsey?" I asked unceremoniously, ignoring the stranger. "Did he—not meet you?"

"No," Mr. Jamieson looked slightly surprised. "I rather expected the car, but we got up all right."

"You didn't see him at all?" Louise demanded breathlessly.

Mr. Jamieson knew her at once, although he had not seen her before. She had kept to her rooms until the morning she left.

"No, Miss Armstrong," he said. "I saw nothing of him. What is wrong?"

"Then we shall have to find him," she asserted. "Every instant is precious. Mr. Jamieson, I have reason for believing that he is in danger, but I don't know what it is. Only—he must be found."

The stocky man had said nothing. Now, however, he went quickly toward the door.

"I'll catch the hack down the road and hold it," he said. "Is the gentleman down in the town?"

"Mr. Jamieson," Louise said impulsively, "I can use the hack. Take my horse and trap outside and drive like mad. Try to find the Dragon Fly—it ought to be easy to trace. I can think of no other way. Only, don't lose a moment."

The new detective had gone, and a moment later Jamieson went rapidly down the drive, the cob's feet striking fire at every step. Louise stood looking after them. When she turned around she faced Gertrude, who stood indignant, almost tragic, in the hall.

"You know what threatens Halsey, Louise," she said accusingly. "I believe you know this whole horrible thing, this mystery that we are struggling with. If anything happens to Halsey, I shall never forgive you."

"I Believe You Know This Whole Horrible Thing, This Mystery."

Louise only raised her hands despairingly and dropped them again.

OBSTINATE SPREADING ECZEMA QUICKLY CURED

Mrs. Wm. C. Wood, Newark, N. J., writes:

"Resinol Ointment cured an obstinate case of spreading Eczema on my little ten year old boy's leg, after various other salves had signally failed. The trouble had existed for six months, and nothing seemed to do any good until we procured a jar of Resinol, which quickly cured him. It has now become a household remedy with us. We also have Resinol Soap in daily use by the children, and their skin, health and complexion are perfect."

Resinol Ointment can be positively relied on to give instant relief and quickly cure the torturing skin diseases of infancy and childhood. For eczema, nettle rash, chafing, disfiguring pimples and itching eruptions of all kinds, it is a prompt and sure remedy.

Every family should be safe-guarded with Resinol preparations—Resinol Ointment to cure the skin troubles that now and then occur; Resinol Soap to use regularly for the toilet and bath, to keep the skin pure and healthy and preserve the complexion. Resinol Medicated Shaving Stick is also the best and safest to use, because it keeps the face free from eruptions and prevents infection.

These preparations are sold at all drug stores.

We send free on application a valuable little booklet on Care of the Skin and Complexion. Send for it. Resinol Chemical Co., Baltimore, Md.

Different Sort of Hair.

"Deceiver!" she hissed. "I hate you!"

"Hate me!" he gasped. "Why, it was only yesterday you said you loved every hair on my head."

"Yes, but not every hair on your shoulder!" she retorted, as she held up a bit of golden evidence.—Stray Stories.

NO HEALTHY SKIN LEFT

"My little son, a boy of five, broke out with an itching rash. Three doctors prescribed for him, but he kept getting worse until we could not dress him any more. They finally advised me to try a certain medical college, but its treatment did no good. At the time I was induced to try Cuticura he was so bad that I had to cut his hair off and put the Cuticura Ointment on him on bandages, as it was impossible to touch him with the bare hand. There was not one square inch of skin on his whole body that was not affected. He was one mass of sores. The bandages used to stick to his skin and in removing them it used to take the skin off with them, and the screams from the poor child were heartbreaking. I began to think that he would never get well, but after the second application of Cuticura Ointment I began to see signs of improvement, and with the third and fourth applications the sores commenced to dry up. His skin peeled off twenty times, but it finally yielded to the treatment. Now I can say that he is entirely cured, and a stronger and healthier boy you never saw than he is to-day, twelve years or more since the cure was effected. Robert Wattam, 1148 Forty-eighth St., Chicago, Ill., Oct. 9, 1909."

The Part of It.

"I wonder if that sour Miss Oldgirl ever had any salad days?"

"I am sure she had the vinegar and peppery part of them."

The Silver Question.

When you see silverware scratched and tarnished with black stains and streaks in the interstices of the ornamental patterns, that is dirt, left there by common, cheap rosin soaps. It is better to use a soap that is antiseptic as well as a perfect cleansing agent. "Easy Task Soap," the hard, white laundry soap, will clean your silverware surely and quickly. It will get out the dirt the other soaps have left. Your grocer will sell you two cakes for ten cents, and if it doesn't satisfy you the makers will give back your dime.

Prompted by Instinct.

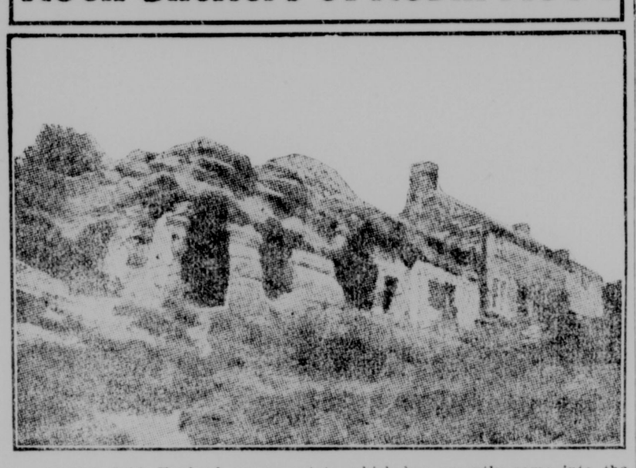
There is a certain type of femininity which instinctively understands the proprieties of a buggy ride. Helen, aged three, cuddled up close to her father, this being her first ride with him unattended. As father tucked the robe about the dainty miss and chirped to his horse he asked: "What shall we talk about, dearie?" "Well, father," as she laid her little hand on his arm, "let's talk about loving each other."

Nothing enlarges the life like letting the heart go out to others.

MARVELS of THE EARTH

CURIOUS, ODD AND INTERESTING OBJECTS AND PLACES

Rock Shelters of Robin Hood



At Mansfield, England, on an estate which has recently come into the hands of the builder, stood some strange old rock dwellings that are now threatened with destruction and which the corporation of Mansfield is trying to save. The origin of these queer houses is unknown, but the tradition is that when Sherwood Forest was in its prime they were used as shelters by outlaws, among others, so the story goes, of Robin Hood himself and his merry men. Latterly they have been inhabited by a colony of besom makers. American visitors to that district make a point of not missing the Mansfield rock houses.

A BOX OF MYSTERY.

A rather creepy thing happened at Italy, Tex., one day recently. A large square box which was unloaded by mistake more than a year ago and had been stored all that time in the freight house of the railroad, was opened by the station agent to ascertain its contents and see if they could give any clue as to the owner. The agent got a queer shock when he opened the box and its ghastly contents were revealed to him. It contained the naked and mummified bodies of a woman and child.

The mysterious box was unloaded from an express car at Italy because the address upon it had been obliterated. An effort was made at the time to discover the person who had shipped it but the search was unsuccessful.

SAGACIOUS DOG.

A remarkable story of a dog's homing instinct and sagacity comes from Tarbert, Scotland. Several months ago a dog was obtained from a Tarbert lady and taken by its new owner by steamer and train to Clydebank. The animal has just turned up at its former home at Tarbert in a much exhausted condition, but showing unmistakable signs of its joy at meeting old friends. At is was not observed in any of the steamers and arrived very late at night, the inference is that it journeyed all the way from the city overland, 100 miles. The mystery is how it found its way back alone by a circuitous and almost trackless route round the heads of the long Clyde lochs.

SWALLOWING TEETH FATAL

A remarkable story was told at an inquest held at Enfield, England, on Mrs. Kate Methuen. In 1908 she was knocked off her bicycle and had four false teeth and a plate knocked out of her mouth. Two of the teeth and part of the plate were found, but the others were not discovered. While fastening her bootlace some weeks ago blood suddenly flowed into her mouth, and she subsequently entered a hospital, where she died. A post-mortem examination revealed the two missing teeth and a piece of the plate fastened in the gullet of the throat, around which an abscess had developed. Death was due to blood poisoning set up by the abscess.

LEASE RUNS TO FINAL DAY

Remarkable terms of a lease granted by a Welsh landowner to the trustees of a Congregational chapel and graveyard at Beulah, near Cardigan, have just been disclosed. In 1860 the lease was made out for ninety-nine years, but recently the landlord was asked to extend it, "so that they might not be disturbed in their last resting place, at least before the Resurrection morn." He asked if the afternoon of the Resurrection Day would not be better, and acting upon that suggestion the lease was made to run to the afternoon of the last day.

BIGGEST OF APPLE TREES

On the farm of Trembley brothers, near Albright, W. Va., is growing what is claimed to be the largest apple tree in that state. The tre is 11 feet in circumference four feet above the ground. It has four limbs which are from four to six feet in circumference, and has one branch four and one-half feet in circumference 20 feet from the ground. The tree has spread 67 feet and is 40 feet high. The estimated age of the tree is 125 years. It is in fine, healthy condition.

NEW WAY TO COMMIT SUICIDE

After no fewer than six unsuccessful attempts to kill himself a sailor named Leon Weiss has finally committed suicide in an original fashion. A month ago he threw himself into a canal at Rheims, but was rescued. A few days later he hanged himself by his braces on a tree in a public square, but his braces broke. He did not despair, however, and, drawing a revolver, shot himself twice. He was taken to the hospital, where he was cured of his wounds. A few days afterward, at Loan railway station, he shot himself just as a train was coming in, hoping to fall beneath the wheels, but again his life was saved and he was taken to the hospital. He managed to tear off his bandages and swallowed them. Then he obtained some water and drank it, and this, with the cotton wool he had swallowed, suffocated him. Thus his seventh attempt was successful.

HOUSE BUILT FROM ONE FIR.

A fourteen room, two and a half story house, built entirely of the lumber from a single fir tree, was recently finished at Elma, on the west coast.

The tree was a giant Douglas fir and was felled west of the town. It was marvelously straight and when scaled was found to contain 40,000 feet of serviceable lumber. Inside the bark the stump measured seven feet and nine inches in diameter, and the total height of the tree was over 300 feet.

At the standard price of $25 a thousand the lumber in this tree was worth more than $1,000. Elma is in the midst of the great fir timber belt on the west slope of the Cascade mountains.

FINDS "FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH."

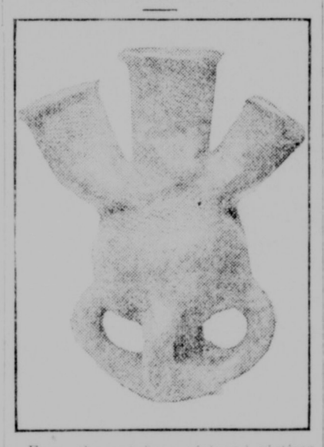
Day Raffety of Portland believes that he has found "the fountain of youth" on the two-acre tract he recently bought on Zigzag river, on the Mount Hood road. Dr. Raffety came out and on examining his land with a view to having it cleared for a summer home, discovered a living spring which possesses mineral qualities of high order. He placed a large sign over the spring, "Fountain of Youth."

IMMENSE CHUTE FOR TIMBER

One of the longest and largest timber chutes in the northwest, is located on the Klamath river, in the extreme northeastern corner of Siskiyou county, California. It is used almost entirely for "shooting" saw logs from the top of a mountain down into the Klamath river. In total length this great chute is about 3,000 feet, and in places it assumes an angle of about 45 degrees. The chute resembles o huge trough more than six feet wide between the two sids at the top. The bottom and sides are about 18 inches thick, all very securely jointed and fitted together and, at short intervals, strongly anchored to the steep mountain side.

Most of the "shooting" is done during the winter months when the chute is coated with snow and ice, or kept wet by rains. When a big log is started down the steep slippery way it gains a tremendous rate of speed before reaching the rolling stream at the moutnain's base—more than 3,000 feet below. So fearful is the swiftness that the friction often scorches both the chute and the bark on the logs. Only a few seconds are required for the big log to make it's journey from top to bottom.

VICTIMS' DRINKING POT



From the pot here pictured victims for sacrifice were made to drink a magic draught in order to "kill" their souls before their bodies perished, so that the souls could not be set free to take vengeance upon the living. The pot came from the place of slaughter at Namugongo, Uganda.

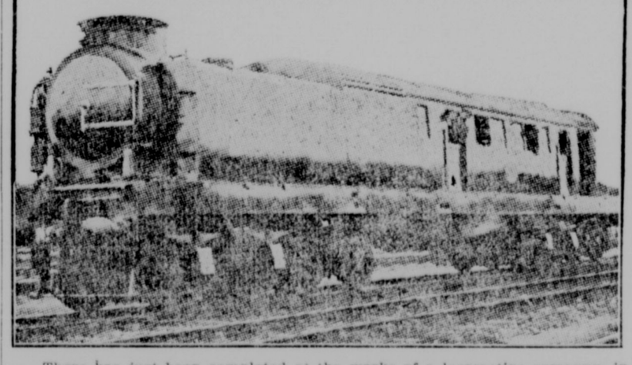
HE OBEYED THE SCRIPTURES

Obeying in a very literal sense the Scriptural injunction, "If thy right hand offend thee," W. A. Gaffney, serving a sentence in the Atlanta (Ga.) stockade, cut off his left hand not long ago. "I don't know why I cut off my hand except that ever since I killed a man everybody seemed to think hard of me," he said, "and since my hand had offended it seemed things might change if I cut it off." Gaffney was tried on the murder charge and was acquitted. Afterwards he came to Atlanta and got into trouble, as a result of which he was sent to the stockade.

QUEER PHOTOGRAPH.

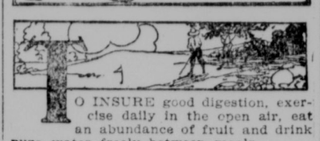
Herr Lehmann, a Swiss farmer, who was struck by lightning during a severe thunderstorm not long ago, has recovered now, but his left side has been beautifully tattooed by the lightning, the skin being entirely covered with "prints" of oak, chestnut and fir leaves. The doctors say the strange photographs will never wash out.

First Turbine Locomotive



There has just been completed at the works of a locomotive company in Glasgow the first steam turbine electric locomotive. The electricity which accentuates the motors is generated by a dynamo driven by a turbine engine, deriving its steam, which is superheated, from a boiler in the rear. The turbine makes 3,000 revolutions per minute developing 1,000 nominal horse power. The essence of this innovation is the securing of increased efficiency and consequent economy in fuel and otherwise, by the adding of a condenser, and substituting the continuous rotary motion of the turbine and dynamo for the reciprocating action of the present wasteful engine. The locomotive with a coach hitched on recently made a very successful maiden run from Glasgow to Gartsherrie and back.

The KITCHEN CABINET



TO INSURE good digestion, exercise daily in the open air, eat an abundance of fruit and drink pure water freely between meals.

Plain, simple foods, as direct as possible from fields, orchards and woods, should always be our aim.

Planning for a Small Family.

When catering for a small family, care, judgment and economy must be used or one kind of food must be served several times in order to avoid waste.

When purchasing utensils and dishes for cooking, choose the size most suitable to the size of the family, as such an investment has a great advantage even in serving leftovers.

In buying a roast, too small a one dries out in cooking and is not an economical purchase. The beef left over may be served in slices heated in a Mexican sauce curry, tomato, or horseradish sauce. The little bits too small to serve may be chopped and seasoned, then used as sandwich filling, or one can always have hash.

Bits of leftover vegetable like carrot, beans or corn, may be added to a salad greatly to its advantage.

Eggs contain no waste and add to the nutriment of a dish. When making an omelet if a few peas are at hand fold them in at the last or serve in a sauce poured around an omelet.

Very tempting desserts may be made from stale cake cut in rounds or fancy shapes, a preserved pear or peach, with a little of the syrup and whipped cream served on each piece.

For a small family one can make so many attractive little dishes that would be entirely out of the question with a larger family.

When using gas a small portable oven to be used over a burner is a great saving.

A delicious dessert which is both pleasing to the eye and the palate is prepared by beating together a half cup of any favorite jelly and the white of one egg. It will take a little time to beat until it stands alone, but the result will repay the effort. Serve in sherbet cups with sweetened whipped cream on top. A change from the usual French toast may be made by cutting the bread in rounds or in some fancy shape, dip in egg and milk and fry in butter as usual. Often a dish refused many times will be welcomed if the appearance is changed. It is necessary in all successful cooking to appeal first to the eye.

RESOLVED to live with all my might while I do live. Resolved, never to lose one moment of time, but improve it in the most profitable way I possibly can. Resolved, never to do any thing which I should despise or think meanly of in another. Resolved, never to do any thing out of revenge. Resolved, never to do any thing which I should be afradd to do if it were the last hour of my life.

—Jonathan Edwards.

Leaks That Sink the Household Ship.

Meat is the most costly and extravagant of all articles of food. Consequently every bit should be saved and worked over.

The cheaper cuts of meat make the best soups and stews. Where a sauce is used to hide the appearance there is no occasion to spend money on choice cuts.

Soup meat, tasteless as it is, may be nicely seasoned and made into pressed meat, hash or other dishes quite as good.

Meat left from beef tea should be saved for highly seasoned dishes. The water has drawn out the flavoring and the stimulating principles of the beef, but the fiber, which contains the greater part of the nourishment, is left undissolved.

After using all the ham that will slice nicely from the bone, chip the remainder for frizzled ham and put the bone in the soup pot.

An ordinary meat grinder will save money and hours of time, as it chops all kinds of food easily.

Fat from meats and soup stock should be carefully saved and clarified, and if carefully done no fat need be bought for general frying.

Tea leaves should be pressed lightly after they have been used and put away to use in sweeping the carpet. They both brighten the carpet and keep the dust from flying over the walls and furniture.

A little water in the wooden tubs will prevent them from falling to pieces.

Twine taken from bundles, if tied together and wound in a ball will aways be ready when a string is wanted.

Fold pieces of manilla paper and put in the wall pocket on the pantry door. Use them for sifting flour and save time and dishes. A piece of paper makes a good moulding board when thickly dusted with flour.

Old tablecloths make fine tray cloths or strips for the table to save the cloth. They are nice for bread and cake cloths, to cover them after baking.

Put the scrubbing brush, vegetable brush and hairbrush bristle side down to dry, otherwise the water soaks into the brush and soon destroys it.

The Treasure and the Pearl

By REV. E. SINCLAIR SMITH
Pastor of Westminster Presbyterian Church, Houston, Texas

THE TREASURE AND THE PEARL.... Text: What is the summum bonum—the chief good.—Matt. 13:44-6.

Again the kingdom of Heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field, the which when a man hath found he hideth and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field.

Again the kingdom of Heaven is like a merchant man seeking goodly pearls, who when he hath found one pearl of great price went and sold all that he had and bought it.

Prof. A. B. Bruce characterizes these two parables as the "Treasure and the Pearl" (or the kingdom of God as the summum bonum or chief good).

These two parables constitute but one text and teach the same general lesson, the incomparable worth of the kingdom of God. They show how the kingdom of God ought to be esteemed in whatever esteem it may in fact be held.

Something that it is worth while giving up everything else in order to attain it. What is this supreme good of human life? We are all looking for hidden treasure. We are all seeking goodly pearls. The only question is what treasure is worth the most? What pearl has the greatest value? What is best worth living for? What is the summum bonum? What, according to Jesus Christ, is the chief good? The treasure it is worth while to barter everything else for? The priceless pearl whose value is greater than all else? Is it not the kingdom of God set up in a man's heart? To have God's kingdom set up in a man's own heart, to be in touch and sympathy with the great interests of Christ's eternal kingdom; this is worth while, worth living for, worth dying for.

This is the only interest deep enough, high enough, comprehensive enough to absorb a man's affection; arouse his energies, develop the best and broadest life. There is only one thing worth living for—the kingdom of God. Christ teaches and experience proves the truth of his teaching that only the kingdom of God set up in a man's heart can satisfy him. He may have everything else under the sun, but unless he has entered into living, loving fellowship with God his soul will thirst for the living God and will never be satisfied until satisfied in God.

Man's chief good is God. The living, loving God as recalled in Christ enthroned in the heart, the source of life eternal; this is man's chief good.

"This is life eternal that they might know this the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

Another term our Savior uses in describing the chief good is "eternal life." If men only knew the significance of those two words—eternal life—they would give up everything they had on earth rather than not possess it.

Like the man who found the hidden treasure, they would sell all that they had to possess that field. Like the merchantman seeking goodly pearls, when they found this pearl of great price they would give up everything they had rather than to give up this priceless pearl.

Let us study these parables a little more closely. They represent two different classes of men. The parable of the man who found the treasure hid in the field represents a man going about his daily business, living a surface life, unaware that just below the surface, if he would dig a little deeper, he would find a rich treasure, not knowing that there is a richer, better life in store for him, until accidentally, as it were, he stumbles upon "the Christian secret of a happy life" and goes on through life rejoicing in his newfound happiness.

The parable of the merchantman seeking goodly pearls represents a different type of a man, one of high ideals and expectations, always reaching out after something better than he possessed, until at last, in his seeking, he comes across the pearl of great price revealed in the peerless one, and he gladly parts with all that he has gained that he may possess it. Such a choice soul was Paul, who said: "What things were gain to me these have I counted loss for Christ. Yea, verily, and I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I suffered the loss of all things and do count them but refuse that I may gain him."

Another choice soul was Justin, martyr, one of the early Christians, who tells us in his writings how he had traveled through the whole circle of Greek philosophy, seeking everywhere for that which would satisfy the deepest needs of his heart's soul, and ever seeking in vain, till he found it at length in the gospel of Christ.

This parable represents an earnest, seeking soul finding at the end of its weary quest Christ, God's answer to the heart's need.

We show our appreciation of the value of this treasure, this pearl, by the earnestness with which we seek to possess it. The man that found this hidden treasure sold all that he had that he might possess this treasure.

If the kingdom of God set up in the heart is the chief good then our only rational course is to give up everything that hinders our possessing it. It is irrational to go through life without possessing ourselves of it.

TEMPERANCE

EVIL OF MODERATE DRINKING

Alcohol is Useful in Arts and Sciences, But Very Injurious to Human System.

Life insurance companies are doing good work in spreading information calculated to promote the health of the people. Pamphlets and letters contain valuable information. These should be read and considered. They are not the vaporings of sentimentalists, but experience of people who make calculation based upon reliable statistics. It is the opinion of insurance authorities that use of alcohol, even moderately, is injurious. Alcohol is a poison, and effects are those of poison. Chemically it is a combination of two parts of carbon, six of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

One leaflet says: "Alcohol is useful in science and in the arts. It is a good fuel and can be burned in a certain kind of stove without formation of clinkers and without injury to the stove. If the stove had a brain, nervous system, kidneys and liver, the results would be different.

"Alcohol can be burned in the human body, and will temporarily produce energy, and also clinkers, but it exacts a heavy toll for this service.

"The man who thinks he can compete with the stove in burning alcohol makes a very great mistake. He is outclassed."

To great extent the "moderate toper" is discriminated against. The "toper" was always disgusting, but the "moderate drinker" (?) was received. He is not regarded as a man of good capacities and reliable. Railroads condemn the moderate drinker. Insurance companies deny him. Great business concerns do not want him. In every field he is discounted. He is incapable of good work, and people know this too well to be imposed upon.

Socially the moderate drinker is tolerated in some circles. His wit is of alcoholic flavor, his eloquence is without intelligence. Ofter he "smells" of what he has smelled. His conversation has the flavor of stale alcohol, weakened by carbon clinkers, and he has become a useless member of society—tolerated because he must be tolerated.

A distressing part of it is that the "moderate" drinker imagines himself entertaining and delightful company, and will not recognize his standing.

Some large companies have collected statistics to determine effects of alcohol on their business. They send bulletins to policy holders and statements which should be arguments for temperance to those not willing to die to win.

Because of loss to them they are enemies to the traffic, and enmity is placed on business principles. No appeals are made to sentiment. Facts speak so strongly that they should be considered.

One company declares alcohol an enemy, and that it is the duty of the companies to combat it. Says another: "Alcohol, by reason of its poisonous effects, is an enemy of life insurance companies. Directly and indirectly, it is responsible for no small portion of the mortality rate."

The effect upon the mortality rate is stated: "The companies, guided by business experience, medical opinion and lay common sense, have always discriminated against the steady tippler, and periodical free drinker. Published statements relating to mortality among immoderates are meager, but the effect of alcohol has, in a broad way, been measured by the experience of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident institution, covering a period from 1866 to 1905. This company aimed to take none but total abstainers and temperate drinkers.

On analyzing the experience it was found that for every 100 deaths among total abstainers there were 131 deaths among the temperate drinkers, showing a difference of 31 per cent. in favor of total abstainers.

For a period of 61 years prior to 1861 the mortality was 83 per cent. greater among moderate drinkers. The Scepter of Life finds that for every 100 deaths among total abstainers there were 146 among the moderate drinkers. These facts speak so strongly that they force attention.

The man who weakens vitality by moderate drinking dies from some other cause—at least so the certificate states. A man who is "burnt out" contracts some disease and dies. The certificate shows consideration for his family and states only part of the truth. The death certificate should read: "This man weakened his vitality and easily became a prey to the disease which directly caused death. Alcohol was one cause of death."

What and When to Drink.

Cold water at all times.

Cocoa, chocolate or hot milk if nervous.

Coffee for a slight stimulant once a day.

Lime juice and lemonade as blood purifiers.

No wine, spirits nor beer; alcohol is a depressant, its stimulating effects being quite temporary.

Between meals is the best time to take liquids, an hour before and an hour after; this dispels the desire for much with meals.

VOTERS WILL NOT FORGET

With election day but four weeks removed, and with the primary contests the country over practically eliminated from the political situation, the national issue is distinctly drawn as between the two leading parties. Such divergencies and differences of view as had sprung up within the Republican party have been fought out at the primaries and settled in the subsequent conventions. Speaking from the viewpoint of the entire national situation, the Republican party has rarely been in more promising shape for a winning. Whatever resentments may have been engendered in the preliminary contests have already drifted into obscurity and forgetfulness. Every good Republican wherever he may be—in whatever state or congressional district—understands that the time is now at hand when he must construe his Republicanism as meaning something more than taking sides between the Insurgents and Standpatters. He recognizes that the issue which he is now facing is whether the destinies of the country are to remain under Republican guidance or to be transferred to Democratic control.

And not those alone who are affiliated as Republicans, but business men, workingmen and all who gauge their political action in accord with sober reason and not merely in response to the party-clan cry, will be putting to themselves the question whether the country is most likely to prosper under a continuation of Republican policies or will fare better by a quick reversal of those policies and the adoption of the program of negations which the Democratic platforms generally are proposing. The sifted down question is whether the Sixty-second Congress is to be in majority Republican or Democratic. The time is at hand when the man who wants to vote intelligently must ask himself what each of the two leading parties really stand for.

Almost without exception—probably without a single exception—the state Democratic platforms that have been formulated for use in the present campaign have expressed disapproval of the Republican principle of protection to home industries and home labor. In spite of the teaching of experience, in spite of the fact that the country has enormously prospered and is now at a very high range of prosperity under the application of the protective policy, the Democratic theorists, according to their chronic habit, are staking hopes of salvation on the advice that this prosperity-producing policy be reversed. They would have a tariff drafted as nearly as possible on the free-trade principle. They would throw the American market open to a flood of manufactured products produced by the under paid labor of Europe and the starvation wage labor of Japan, China and India Asia is building modern textile mills, shoe factories, sugar refineries and is getting into the manufacturing game with labor paid from six to nine cents a day for a ten hour day. Is the American working man likely to vote for a proposition that will bring him into a life-or-death struggle, with the low-priced labor of the Orient?

That is the question which he must settle for himself before he casts his ballot next November. And the American farmer has a similar question put straight up to him in the opposing policies of the two leading parties. He cannot fail to comprehend that the Republican protective policy has built up for him the splendid home market. He certainly will not forget that when the Democratic party was last in power it tinkered the tariff with results that were disastrous to the manufacturing industries and the farming industries alike. The majority of farmers date their experiences to the era of the Wilson-Gorman tariff under which the country tried to do business from 1893 to 1897, and they will not have forgotten that it was an era of 50-cent wheat, 25-cent corn, 5-cent cotton and 5-cent pork, and it was also an era during which the value of farm lands slumped from 50 to 70 per cent. Every branch of trade and industry went more or less to the bow-wows under the Democratic Wilson-Gorman tariff. The whole country, from Maryland to California, was in the dumps, and the country is not going to forget it.

The two leading parties—the Republand Democratic—each stand for a distinctly defined policy, and the problem now before the voters of Maryland and every other state in the Union is a choosing between these policies. Otherwise it is a choosing between a condition of prosperity in possession and the shadow of a greater prosperity that the Domocratic theorists are promising.

READY FOR THE BLAST.

GRANTSVILLE.

We always feel like honoring those who are bringing something to pass such as Mr. James A. Enlow, of Mt. Lake Park, who is so well known and highly esteemed at his own home and throughout the county for his good work and who did a grand missionary work during his short stay in Grantsville, vicinity by getting bibles into homes that hadn't any and also distributing tracts.

Rev. Charles Beachy and wife, who spent some time at his home in Grantsville left on the 27th of Sept. for Wheeling, W. Va., to attend the wedding of Mrs. Beachy's sister, Miss Clara McConnell, after which they will go to Chicago, where Rev. Beachy has work for the winter.

Rev. D. A. Friend of the M. E. church preached a very interesting farewell sermon and we were sorry to have him leave us.

Mr. J. A. Augustine, whose home was recently broken up by death entering and taking his good wife, has gone to Accident to spend some time with his daughter, Mrs. Englehart. Mr. Augustine was one of our best citizens and church workers and is greatly missed.

The fever cases of our town are doing nicely.

We were sorry to learn of the death of Mrs. J. J. Michael, of Mt. Zion. She was a beautiful character and will be greatly missed not only at home but by the entire vicinity. The family has our heartfelt sympathy.

Sunday School Sunday morning at M. E. Church, 9.30, Miss Ella Beachy, Supt.

Preaching has been announced also for Sunday morning Oct. 16, at 10.30 by the new pastor, who we understand, is Rev. W. W. Morris. Let all the members come out and give him a hearty welcome. League in the evening, 7.30 lead by Mr. Joel Miller.

Rev. Charles Beachy sold to Mr. John Miller a couple of lots in the west end of Grantsville.

Has a Warm Spot In His Heart for Oakland.

To the Editor of The Republican:

As I am leaving Oakland today to return to my home in Baltimore, I take this opportunity of saying farewell to all of my friends in Oakland. I have been greatly benefitted by my stay here and have fully regained my health once more.

I want to thank the people of your town for the kind treatment and hospitality which they shown towards me, with the exception of a few, which I have forgiven, as not one of us are perfect.

I have enjoyed my stay and I have had a very pleasant and sociable time. I shall always keep a warm spot in my heart for Oakland and its people and will only be to glad to do them a favor if it lays in my power.

I hope to be able in the future to return to Oakland and pay it a friendly visit.

Thanking all for their past favors, I am, Respectfully yours.

GIVE THEM A START

This would be a good time for you to start your young folks on the road to Success.

Early training in the practice of self-denial; instruction as to the use and value of money; opportunities for earning and saving money; all these tend to fix and fasten the children in the ways of thrift and prosperity.

We most gladly assist the young people in getting started.

One Dollar opens an account and entitles the depositor to one of our Savings Banks.

We shall be pleased to have our Garrett County friends call and open an account with us.

Mr. and Mrs. Norman R. Sanner are visiting relatives at Deep Creek.

Mr. James M. Litzinger, of the Grafton Leader, was in Oakland Tuesday evening on business.

Mr. William G. Hinebaugh left Tuesday night for Hagerstown where he will vist the Washington county fair.

Rev. Nicola Di Stefano, of Buckhannon, was in Oakland Monday night on his way to Washington, D. C., on business.

Mr. and Mrs. John A. Grant, who were on a visit to Baltimore, Washington and Winchester, have returned to Oakland.

Rev. G. R. Williamson, who visited friends at Sutton and vicinity several days last and this week, returned to Oakland Tuesday.

The Board of County Commissioners, in session this week, transacted a great deal of routine business, but none of public importance.

Mr. Andrew Friend, of near Friendsville, was in the city yesterday having brought to Oakland his daughter who entered the high school.

Messrs. William and Edward Spoerlein, of Accident, left Oakland Tuesday night for a visit to the Pacific coast. They expect to be gone several months, returning to their home in the spring.

Mrs. J. W. Ramsey, of Baltimore, who visited her cousin, Mrs. S. E. Shirer in Oakland for several weeks, went to Fairmont Tuesday afternoon where she will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Spedden for a week.

Mr. Robert Shirer, of Morgantown, is spending this week in Oakland with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Shirer He expects to return to Morgantown, accompanied by his wife, who has been here for two weeks, on Monday.

Mr. Stuart F. Hamill returned from Des Moines, Iowa, Monday, where he and his mother, Mrs. G. S. Hamill, were called on account of the illness of Mr. Byrne Hamill. Mrs. Hamill remained at Des Moines to accompany her son home as soon as he is able to travel.

Mrs. G. Arthur Fraley and son Lawrence, who went to Baltimore two weeks ago where Mrs. Fraley expected to be operated upon, returned to Oakland yesterday morning, the physicians at the hospital thinking the time inopportune to perform the operation now.

Rev. and Mrs. J. B. Workman and little daughter Rebecca arrived in Oakland Tuesday afternoon from Wheeling, where Mr. Workman will remain for a few days. Mrs. Workman and daughter will prolong their visit and will be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Grover C. Stemple.

Messrs. Paul Naylor and Ralph Weber, of Oakland, left here Tuesday morning for a two weeks outing which will be spent by the young men in the Maine woods hunting moose and other big game. They went well prepared for the hunt, taking with them express rifles and other artillery.

Messrs. J. M. Falkenstein and H. V. Leighton have sold their farm a few miles west of Oakland to Rev. James W. Beeghley, of near Accident. It was Mr. Beeghley's intention to leave Garrett county and reside on the Eastern Shore, where he also bought a farm recently, but he has changed his plans and will continued to reside in Garrett county. Messrs. Falkenstein and Leighton advertise in this paper today the sale of a large lot of property to take place at the farm on October 29th.

THE DEATH RECORD.

FRANKLIN SUTER.

The death of Mr. Franklin Suter which occured Tuesday, at Hoyes, removed one of the best known and most highly esteemed citizens of that part of Garrett county. Mr. Suter was born in Somerset county, Pa., and had been a resident of Garrett county for a long time. He was aged 77 years, 8 months and 5 days. He is survived by his widow, one son, Jacob and two daughters, namely, Mrs. Arch Glotfelty and Mrs. John Glotfelty; also by two sisters, Mrs. Noah Pysell, and Mrs. James Skiles, all being residents of this county. A deceased daughter was the wife of Mr. A. G. Ross, of Oakland, and mother of Master Frank Ross. The funeral will occur this afternoon at two o'clock from the residence of the deceased and will be conducted byRev. H. E. Friend. The interment will be made in the family burying ground on the farm.

MRS. ELIZABETH WILEY MICHAEL.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wiley Michael, an aged and highly esteemed resident of Garrett county, died October 6th 1910, at her home about 7 miles west of Frostburg. Dropsy and heart trouble were the cause of her death. Miss Elizabeth Wiley was born in Garrett county, September 8th, 1827, and was married to John J. Michael, Nov. 28th, 1844, the union resulting in a family of twelve children, eleven of whom with her husband survive. They are S. K. Michael, of Daytona, Fla.; Mrs. S. C. Robeson, Avilton, Md.; Mrs. Mary A. Pope, Mt. Lake Park, Md.; Mrs. Rebecca Durst, Lonaconing, Md.; F. A. Michael, Cascade Locks, Ore.; Ella E. Michael, Shade Mills, Md.; Wm. H. Michael, Frostburg, Md.; J. C. Michael, Oakland, Fla.; Mrs. Lulu G. Friend, Morgantown, W. Va.; Mrs. Emma Kitching, Stewart, Fla., and Miss Angie Michael, Garrett county. Beside the above children she leaves thirty-seven grandchildren and seventeen greatgrandchildren, and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. The funeral was held in the Mt. Zion Methodist Episcopal church Sunday morning, Oct. 9th, conducted by Rev. Wolf, of Frostburg. Mrs. Michael was converted in early life and joined the Methodist Episcopal church, of which she was a consistent member for about sixty years. She was compelled to keep her bed for almost a year. She bore her suffering with Christian fortitude, and was ready to answer the call of Him whom she had served so faithfully for so many years.

All through her long life she was ever ready to minister to those in trouble or distress, and never failed when opportunity afforded to give words of Christian council to those about her. May all those who are left to mourn follow her Christian example and be ready to answer the summons when the Master shall call.

Rev. John M. Davis returned to Oakland Saturday night from a pleasant week's visit to his old home in Somerset county, Pa., where he met many of his former friends and schoolmates, picked apples from trees he planted more than half a century ago and viewed many scenes with which he was familiar as a boy.

Miss Irene Haulenbeek and her brother, Mr. Elmer Haulenbeek, have returned to Deer Park from Ocean City, New Jersey, where they spent several weeks. Mrs. Haulenbeek and little son, Elmer, Jr., made a stop in Philadelphia to visit her father, Mr. Charles F. Schoolman, who is quite ill. Mr. Schoolman spent the summer at Deer Park.

Dr. A. J. Fristoe, evangelist of the State of Maryland, delivered a fine discourse at the Deer Park Baptist church last Sunday. His topic was "The Transfiguration." Dr. Fristoe is holding special services at the Loch Lynn Baptist church this week, in conjunction with the Rev. C. W. Hudson, its pastor. The meetings thus far have been very successful and much interest manifested.

FIRST SECTION OF ROAD FINISHED

Contractor Francis Completed His Work Last Saturday.

Mr. J. E. Francis, who had the contract for building the first section of the State Road north from Oakland, completed the work on last Saturday and had his machinery, wagons and tools brought to Oakland where they will all be thoroughly overhauled and put in condition for work, either here or elsewhere, in the spring.

The road completed by Mr. Francis is a splendid piece of work, and firmly constructed and bids fair to be a lasting improvement.

Too Late to Exhibit.

H. C. Hostetler, one of the most progressive farmers of Garrett county, Md., who lives on the State road about two miles from Oakland, arrived at the Meyersdale Fair last Wednesday with a fine Belgian colt, which he desired to enter for a premium, but was too late, as the entries closed before Tuesday noon. Mr. Hostetler is raising some fine thoroughbred draft animals. He sold a good pair of colts to a Bedford county man last year, and has several more good ones coming on. Mr. Hostetler was born and spent the greater part of his life at Summit Mills, and brought his wife and five of their children over to visit the old home. The two eldest children remained at home to look after the farm. Besides attending the fair, while here, Mr and Mrs. Hostetler also attended the lovefeast of the Church of the Brethren at Summit Mills, last Sunday evening.—Meyersdale Republican.

Terms: Cash on day of sale or when property is moved.

JOHN M. WHITE.

Public Sale of Valuable Real Estate.

I will offer for sale at public auction, at 2:00 o'clock p. m., Saturday, October 15th, 1910, in front of my office in the town of Oakland, Md., the farm of W. O. Kimmell, located in Garrett county about four miles northeast of the town of Hutton.

This farm contains 112 acres, is quite level, good soil, 30 acres cleared, 50 acres under good fence and a county road runs through the center of the property. There are no buildings except an old shed, but there is approximately 150,000 feet of saw timber on the farm. The coal is reserved and will not be sold.

Here is an opportunity for some young man to get a good farm at the right price. Look it over, or call on me for further particulars, and be prepared to buy. Stop renting and dividing with the landlord.

Terms of Sale—One half cash on day of sale and balance on easy terms.

E. S. WEST,
32-2t Agent for owner.

An Open Air Wedding.

A very novel and unique wedding took place a few miles from Grantsville on the afternoon of Sunday, Oct. 2, with Miss Christena Echard and Mr. Jonas Brant as the contracting parties. The bride had no attendants, there was no best man except the groom, but regardless of conventionalities, filled with their love for each other, the young couple joined hands out under the beautiful blue canopy of the heavens, with the birds singing joyously above them, and took the sacred vows which made them man and wife. Rev. L. P. Young, of Salisbury, performed the novel ceremony. The newly wedded pair are from McHenry, Md.—Grantsville Cor. Meyersdale Republican.

BOLDEN, BROWN & WEIMER.

WONDERS of the SOUTHWEST

By N. H. DARTON, U. S. Geological Survey

THE southwestern section of the United States is a province that presents many special characteristics of physiography, climate, resources and capabilities which are not as well known as they deserve to be. The term "southwest" is usually applied to New Mexico, Arizona and southern California, an area of about the size of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland and the Virginias. Much public attention has of late been attracted to Arizona and New Mexico in connection with their admission to statehood, and one gratifying result of this has been a greatly increased interest in their resources and conditions.

Excluding the populous and thrifty coast region of southern California, the southwest is the most thinly populated and least developed portion of the country south of Alaska. As this condition is due mainly to a climate so arid that but little can be raised without irrigation, its future development is to be measured by the utilization of the vast volume of flood waters now going to waste. This water can be applied to millions of acres of level lands with rich soil, which with the unending sunshine of its mild climate will respond with large and profitable crops.

Unfortunately, there is not enough water for all the land, but there is sufficient, if all were utilized, to support a population many times as large as the present one. The government is now spending $12,000,000 in reclamation projects in Arizona and New Mexico which supply water for nearly one-half million acres of fertile land. This will give great impetus to development, and in time, when settlers take up the reclaimed land, there will be a large increase in its agricultural productions.

In the great coast region of southern California, with a population of nearly 600,000, the principal product is the orange and other fruits, with a value of about $20,000,000 a year, while in the inland districts the mining industry is the largest source of revenue. Portions of the southwest are richly productive of various minerals, notably those of copper, and recently southern California has become a heavy producer of petroleum. The value of the copper, oil and other products of the ground aggregates about $75,000,000 a year.

It is probable that further exploration will disclose large additional supplies of ores of various kinds, especially those of low grade, which will prove profitable under improved methods of reduction.

The southwest presents a variety of topographic features, and many of its economic resources are closely related to them. There is great range in altitude, with corresponding variation in climatic conditions. One of the most salient features is the wide, high plateau of northern Arizona, which reaches an altitude of 8,000 feet. It is surmounted by various volcanic peaks, notably San Francisco peak, which is 12,611 feet above sea level.

To the east this district merges into an irregular series of high plateaus, constituting the western half of New Mexico.

To the west and south it drops by huge steps into the great region of desert valleys or bolsons of Nevada, western Arizona, and southeastern California. These deserts are wide, long plains, lying between mountain ridges of varying lengths and heights, ridges which are all very rocky and mostly treeless and trend north and south.

Diagonally across southern California there extends the long curving ridge of the Sierra Madre and San Bernardino mountains, between which and the ocean lies the large oval area known as the valley of southern California. This valley is the great citrus fruit district, and Los Angeles.

There are two great rivers in the southwest, the Colorado and the Rio Grande. The Colorado river has been compared to the Nile and the similarity is notable. Both are streams of the first rank, rising in high mountains, and finally crossing a broad region of semi-tropical, nearly rainless deserts. Both empty into seas in nearly the same latitude, and their lower courses are through wide deltas of fertile soil. The annual overflows add new sediments fertile with plant food and at a time favorable for the crops.

The agricultural capabilities are closely similar, but while much of the lower Nile valley is utilized the Colorado valley is just beginning to be settled. The watershed area of the Colorado, with its two head branches, the Green and the Grand, is over 200,000 square miles, its course 2,000 miles in length, and its annual discharge is 11,000,000 acre-feet, or enough to cover that number of acres one foot deep.

The sediment which it carries each year into the gulf is estimated to be sufficient to cover 53 square miles one foot deep. For 200 miles of its course across the high plateau of northeastern Arizona it cuts the wonderful Grand canyon, which in places is nearly a mile deep. South of the canyon it flows mostly in broad valleys, but cuts through several desert ridges, finally passing out into the wide delta plain extending to its mouth.

The Rio Grande is a large river rising in the mountains of Colorado, traversing New Mexico from north to south, and finally constituting the boundary line between Texas and Mexico.

The definition of a desert given by the dictionaries, "a dry, sandy region without vegetation or inhabitants," is defective, and the idea that it is necessarily flat is erroneous. Most portions of the average desert bear an extensive, though somewhat widely spaced, flora. Many desert regions contain numerous settlements, the Sahara desert for instance having a population of 2,500,000. Loose sand is a minor feature, and much more prevalent on the seacoasts and along the bottom lands of rivers. There are wide areas of bare rocks, and the larger deserts include mountains, ridges, mesas and deep canyons.

The deserts of the southwest are regions of very scanty rainfall, parts of them having only three inches a year and evaporation of eighty inches or more.

This canyon is the mile-deep gorge cut by the Colorado river across the high plateau of northern Arizona. The view from the rim reveals the most stupendous panorama imaginable, for one sees into an area of about 600 square miles filled with an endless variety of most rugged topographic forms of many beautiful colors. On the sky-line, ten to fifteen miles away, is the edge of a wide-reaching plateau, and in the middle ground of the picture flows the Colorado river, nearly a mile below one's feet.

The features are so gigantic and so plainly in view that all sense of scale is lost, and it is not until one has been down to the bottom of the canyon at the river level that any adequate sense of proportion can be gained.

The canyon was discovered by Cardenas, who went to its edge in 1540 on a branch trip from Coronado's expedition, on information obtained by Tovar from the Hopi Indians. The original name given to the river was Tison, Spanish for firebrand, and it is to be regretted that the name has not been retained to avoid the present confusion due to the river having the same name as the state.

Coon butte, another of the greatest wonders in our country, is also situated in the southwest, but owing to its distance from the railroad it is seldom visited. It is a great crater-like bowl in the plateau, about ten miles south of Canyon Diablo station. "The crater" is about 4,000 feet wide and 600 deep, with an irregular encircling rim of loose rock fragments from 120 to 160 feet high.

The petrified forests attract many visitors, especially the most accessible one south of Adamana, a station on the Santa Fe railroad a few miles east of Holbrook. There is a large quantity of the material in sight here, some of it in large logs. One of these logs spans a small draw as a natural bridge.

Arizona possesses a very picturesque natural bridge of limestone spanning Pine creek, in Gila county, 70 miles south of Flagstaff. It does not, however rival the great bridges recently discovered in Utah. Its span is 80 feet, its height about 125 feet, and its length up and down the creek is over 400 feet.

Canyon de Chelly is one of the most notable scenic features in Arizona, but it is so far off the main line of travel that it is rarely visited. It is cut deeply into soft sandstones, which rise in vertical walls, with many outlying pinnacles and monuments. Some of these features appear also in the great wall of red sandstone on the north side of the wide depression through which the Santa Fe railroad crosses the continental divide east of Gallup. One of the most remarkable pinnacles of this wall is fancifully termed the Navajo Church.

Few persons who travel across the southwest realize that in Arizona and New Mexico there are enormous forests of valuable timber and that the lumbering is an important industry. In both territories there are several large forest reservations, and one of these in Arizona, the Coconino forest, with nearly 6,000 square miles, is the largest single reserve in the United States. The total forest area reserved in Arizona is 15,250,130 acres, or more than 24,000 square miles, and in New Mexico there are 10,971,711 acres, or more than 17,000 square miles. Southern California also has several large reserves.

The Coconino forest in Arizona occupies part of the great plateau in which the Grand Canyon is cut, and extends to the brink of the canyon.

The visitor to the southwest usually takes keen interest in the Indians, who are numerous not only along the main lines of travel, but in many remote villages. Some tribes, notably the Apaches, who continued to be troublesome until a relatively recent date, have become famous for the misdeeds that materially retarded the development of Arizona and western New Mexico. Now, however, all is peace and tranquillity. The newspapers, especially eastern ones, occasionally print accounts of uprisings, but these prove to be local quarrels with a few individuals.

The Indians of the southwest are of two kinds, differing greatly in most of their characteristics. One is the nomad type, represented by the Apaches, Navajos, the Yumas, Papagoes and Pimas, and smaller tribes; the other is the pueblo type, which is comprised of 26 pueblos, or villages, scattered through central and western New Mexico, and in the Hopi reserve, in northwestern Arizona.

Probably there is greater popular interest in the pueblo people, for their settlements are permanent and mostly very ancient, and their religious ceremonies are extremely elaborate and picturesque. They live in villages of several hundred inhabitants, in substantial stone or adobe houses, some of which are in groups, rising in tiers to a height of four or five stories, with streets and central plaza. They are peaceful and industrious, raising crops largely by irrigation. They have herds of cattle and sheep, and spinning, weaving and making their garments is one of their important occupations.

Work appears evenly divided between men and woman in the pueblos. The men do the farming, tend to the cattle and sheep, do the hunting, build the houses, and have many smaller trades and occupations. The women do the housework, grind the corn, make pottery, blankets and clothes.

The visitor is generally impressed by the pueblo people and pleased with the agreeable home life and simple hospitality which they readily offer.

The interesting features of the southwest, notably the beauty of the coast region and the special climatic advantages, draw a large number of tourists and health-seekers, especially in winter, and every year sees a substantial increase in the influx of visitors.

Because of its dry air and mild climate the southwest has become famous as a health resort, especially for those having tuberculosis of the respiratory organs. The percentage of cures made in New Mexico, Arizona and California, great as it is, would be much greater if a larger proportion of those who are seeking health came in time. It is necessary to come before the vitality is too greatly diminished and then to live under favorable conditions, the most essential of which is to be out of doors as much as possible.

Many health-seekers spend most of their money in railroad fare to reach the desired resorts. Physicians do a great wrong to patients in sending them so far from home, friends and care without means to provide suitable quarters, nourishment and attention to sustain them while making their fight against death.

The climate of the southwest presents considerable variety, but in all the lower lands the winters are delightfully mild, and everywhere blue sky is in evidence for more than 300 days in the year. The summers are warm; in the southern desert area they are decidedly hot for several months, but the dry air even then is much more endurable than the sultry summer weather of the eastern and central states. Sunstroke is unknown, and laborers continue their work without distress.

The valley of southern California is protected from the cold northern winds of winter by high mountain ranges, while to the south it is open to the Pacific. Owing to the peculiar configuration of the coast the cold California current from the north is deflected west near Point Conception, and hence the southern California shores have waters warmer by about ten degrees than those to the north.

This beneficent climate is responsible for the giant industry of fruit growing which has made California famous over the globe. California furnishes the major part of the very large amount of oranges and other citrus fruits consumed in the United States, and this business has been the potent cause in the development of southern California.

The orange and other citrus fruits of southern California have an output of about 30,000 carloads a year, with a net value of more than $15,000,000.

East of the mountains in southern California is an extensive desert country, much of it without water, but large areas can be reached by ditches from the Colorado river. The most notable district of the sort of in the Salton desert, near the Mexican boundary. A few years ago this was a lonely and forbidding region, but now, by aid of irrigation from the Colorado river, it has several thriving settlements, with 100,000 people and 200,000 acres of cultivated land. That portion of it known as Imperial valley has the greatest development, and with rich soil and semi-tropical climate phenomenal results have been obtained when water is applied.

One of the best known products of this region is the canteloupe, of which the annual shipments are over 1,800 cars, bringing nearly a million dollars. This valley contains over 400,000 acres of land, and just across the Mexican line are 200,000 more.

The great oil fields of California are in the southern part of the state, and with rapidly increasing production they promise to be the largest producers in the country.

Hats for Mourning

THREE hats of excellent design are shown for those who are wearing mourning. it will be noticed that the shapes are small or moderate in size, that the designs are simple but the workmanship intricate and beautiful. These characteristics are what the wearer should look for when purchasing mourning millinery.

The first hat, a small round turban with rolling brim, is made of tiny folds of crape laid in parallel rows on circles about them or four inches in diameter. These are applied to the crown and brim which have previously been covered with crape laid on plain. The wire frame is covered and lined with silk and the hat is finished with a wired bow of taffeta. A rolled border of crape sometimes binds the edges of such bows and makes a very handsome finish for the ornament.

Fig. 2 shows a moderately large flat brimmed hat in which the underbrim is faced with chiffon and the upper brim and crown are of crape fitted to the shape wings made of folds of chiffon are used for trimming. They are even more effective when made of folds of crape in hats for first mourning. The veil of point de esprit, is bordered with crape and dull jet ornaments hold it to place. Cabochons of the same are sewed to the wings.

No. 3 is a turban made of uncut velvet which is one of the richest materials used in mourning millinery. A soft crown and puffed rim are arranged by shirrings in the material. The role trimming is a full bunch of black fancy feathers in aigrette effect, at the right side. A net veil of fine Brussels is finished with a simple embroidery design in silk. Such veils bordered with a two-inch band of crape, or with three narrow crape folds, are very elegant. Black lynx furs are worn and black suede gloves.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY

NEW SHIRT-WAIST MODEL.

This new model is of tussah silk or drap de soie. It is trimmed in an original way with applique bands of the material and with straps of passementerie.

COMBINING LACE AND BEADING

Slight Carelessness or Lack of Preparation Sufficient to Mar the Result.

When lace and beading are to be sewed to thin materials, such as muslin dresses or underwear of any kind, it must be carefully and thoroughly done to produce good results. Lace edging nearly always has a stout thread in the selvedge which serves admirably as a gathering thread. Pull this thread and stroke the gathers to make them even. Roll the edge of the material and, holding the lace and edge together with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, with the lace nearest you, overcast the two together with firm even stitches. When sewed to a straight edge insertion can be sewed in exactly the same manner, but to let insertion in, to form a design, first baste the material on the right side to form the desired design, and hem it down on both edges. Cut the material from underneath the insertion, leaving a narrow strip on each side of the insertion. Crease this strip back from the insertion toward the material and turn as for a hem. Overhand this, taking stitches close to the line of the hemming.

FASHION EASY TO FOLLOW

Additions in Dress Accessories That Are Well Within the Reach of All.

There is a late fancy among some Parisian costumers for making the belts of the more elaborate gowns of a color in contrast to the whole color scheme of the garment.

This girdle, though differing in its tone, is of like material, and is merely a new touch—a little oddity—and more evident because of the attention bestowed on the waist line at present.

A dinner gown of sapphire blue, trimmed with crystal embroidery, is given an old rose girdle, and the combination could win its way anywhere, so knowing and artistic was the choice of shades.

Not in years has there been a season when small accessories could add so much to the general style of a costume as do the neck and wrist frills worn with the tailor-made suits of every color, design and material. Such frills may be developed of wide lace, plain or fancy net, chiffon, tulle and even sheer lawn. And the best feature of the fashion is that every woman may, if she wishes, be her own frill maker.

Chiffon, tulle and lawn are undeniably perishable, but then frills of these materials are inexpensive, if home-made, and quite as becoming as those of lace or net.

The art of fine needlework is more in favor now than it has been for many years past, and where children's frocks are concerned remnants of lawn, muslin, lace and embroidery that have been secured at reduced prices during the summer sales can be made up into fascinating little garments at a nominal cost.

To Hold Her Veil Tight.

One girl has conceived the idea of running narrow beading around the bottom and threading it with baby ribbon, which she pins at back. Both beading and ribbon are, of course, of the color of the veil, and fasten under the chin, so as to be inconspicuous. She finds this a solution of the veil problem with a low-necked blouse, as her veil never looks either untidy or bulky.

New Combinations.

The latest in color combinations is a dark red and a rather bright blue, so combined as to give the effect of the modish purple. This is very smart indeed, but be careful not to trim with either of these colors; black is the best, or some neutral shade.

COW STABLE COMFORTABLY ACCOMMODATES MANY HEAD

Pabst Cow Stable.

The cow stable erected upon the farm of Fred Pabst at Oconomowoc, Wis., is thirty-eight feed wide and 144 feet long and will comfortably accommodate fifty-four head of cattle exclusive of those which for any reason may be confined in the two large box stalls, says Homestead. The two rows of cows face toward a common feeding alley which is fourteen feet in width and which opens to the out-of-doors at either end of the barn through a large doorway. Back of each row of cows is a ten-foot manure alley which gives ample room for workmen. The barn is supplied with thirty-five windows, which admit abundant light, and an extensive ventilating system which continuously provides fresh air and withdraws the gases and other impurities. A wash room, fully equipped with the necessary appliances, enables the manager to enforce greater cleanliness than would be possible or practicable without this equipment. The feed room and the silos open into the feed alley, and are therefore conveniently situated for the feeder. The barn is modern throughout and is one of the very best models built in recent years in the West.

CAUSES OF HORSE COLIC

Farm Animal Will Thrive, Work Better and Remain Healthier if Given "Hard Feed" During Busy Season.

(By S. C. MILLER.)

When a farm horse is working hard it does not pay to let him eat grass when it is green. He will thrive, work better and remain healthier and more enduring if fed "hard feed" during the busy season. The soft, washy, green grass is palatable of course, but it makes the horse soft and flabby, keeps the bowels too loose, and is apt to induce colic.

If the horse has no work to do he may go on pasture right along and have little grain and when his work is done in late summer he may enjoy the fall pasture made green again by rains. The pasture also is a good place for the brood mare as it promotes flow of milk.

We find that severe attacks of colic often are caused by allowing the hot, tired horse to eat grass at the road side when he has made a long trip to town.

The trouble, too, is prone to come on when horses are suddenly fed new hay or new oats. Both new hay and new oats should be fed in small quantities gradually at first, and along with old hay and oats until the horses become accustomed to the change.

Either the new feed is so palatable that the horse eats too much of it, or it contains some ferment that sets up indigestion and formation of gas.

Water very seldom causes colic. Nature intends horses to have all of it they want, at any and all times and so provided it does no harm. We may cause trouble by withholding drinking water for long periods of time and then forcing the hot, tired horses to drink too much of it at noon and especially just after eating grain.

Allow the work horse adequate supplies of cool, pure water often when he is at work and he never will take too much of it or suffer ill effects from drinking. Indeed the water so given will be likely to prevent sickness and always is appreciated and beneficial.

The Best Rations for Hogs.

Recent experiments at the Missouri station prove that corn, good corn, is a good feed for any animal, and that there is no reason for withholding it from any animal needing food. At the same time, it is shown that corn alone is not nearly so good or so profitable a feed as corn supplemented by some proteid food, such as tankage, linseed oil meal or soy beans.

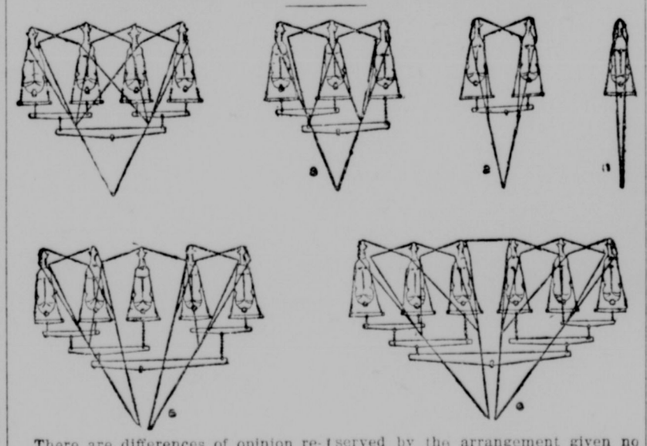
In hogs fed exclusively on corn the animal becomes very fat and chubby, and does not develop properly; the bones are brittle and easily broken. Sixty-five hogs were used in this experiment, and they were divided into lots of five each. Twelve different rations were used, with corn alone in two of them, and corn supplemented with some other feed in the others.

The hogs fed on corn and linseed oil meal and those fed on corn and tankage gained the most; those receiving corn alone were most unsatisfactory.

Clover for Horses.

An experiment conducted at the Illinois experiment station in fattening horses for market showed that clover is worth twice as much as timothy, pound for pound, in putting flesh on the animals. It is the belief of the station that its value will be more highly appreciated as a horse feed when corn forms all or part of the grain ration than where all oats are fed. Clover hay, being rich in protein, renders it especially valuable for feeding young horses.

EVENERS AND SINGLE-TREES



There are differences of opinion regarding the correct arrangement of eveners and single-trees, and in particular the lines or reins. The latter depends much upon the temper of the horse. One farmer drives several horses abreast without the use of lines or whip, having trained them to go, back, and turn by queer sounding calls, writes I. G. Bayley in Popular Mechanics. Another farmer drives six horses abreast with a single pair of lines attached to the outside horses, the inside horses being connected with single straps.

The methods of harnessing up from one to six horses abreast are shown in the sketch, which has been approved by several farmers that have had several years of experience. The methods shown are for plows, scoops or road-scrapers. When connecting to wagons the only difference is in the design of the last evener, which has a hole in the center for connecting to the pole or tongue instead of the chain hook. Single-trees and eveners for wagons are usually made about one-third heavier than for plows, keeping the same lengths throughout. It will be observed by the arrangement given no horse is able to shirk his duty without being detected. In such a case, the evener will turn in favor of the horse working best, thus enabling the driver to spot the guilty one.

Watering the Horse.

As the work a horse does increases the amount of water he requires increases as with an engine, if not in the same proportion. This is especially true in hot weather. The working horse needs large quantities of water, and needs it often. If it is not supplied it is absorbed from the body tissues; they shrink and the horse is said to get poor. Failure to give sufficient water is far more frequently the cause of farm horses getting poor during the working season than lack of feed. Horses suffer seriously from the usual practise of allowing them to go from one feeding period till the next in hot weather without water. A good rule is to water the first thing in the morning, then within two hours after each feed and the last thing in the evening.

Puzzled by Wireless.

"Mistah Jenkins," asked an old negro of Atlanta of his employer, "would yo' be so good, sah, as to explain to me 'bout this wireless telegraph business I hears 'em a-talking 'bout?"

"Why, certainly, Henry," responded the employer, "though I can do so only in a general way, as I myself know little of the subject. The thing consists in sending messages through the air instead of over wires."

"Yassah," said Henry, "I knows 'bout dat; but, sah, what beats me is how dey fasten the air to the poles!"

USED HYPODERMICS.

Only Relief From Terrible Suffering.

Thomas E. Vest, 1505 S. 12th St., Terre Haute, Ind., says: "I had no control over the urine and the pain when voiding it was so great I often screamed. I grew worse and lay in bed for weeks, the only relief being from hypodermics. I was treated by three physicians without help and the last one said an operation was necessary. At this time I began using Doan's Kidney Pills and passed a gravel stone as large as a pea. The next day I passed two more and from then on improved rapidly until cured."

Even the Children.

Ex-Governor Pennypacker, condemning in his witty way the American divorce evil, told at a Philadelphia luncheon an appropriate story.

"Even our children," he said, "are becoming infected. A Kensington schoolteacher, examining a little girl in grammar, said:

"'What is the future of love?'

"'A divorce,' the child answered promptly."

The Prettiest Girl in Cincinnati.

"My niece," said a well known man the other day, "is often called the prettiest girl in Cincinnati. I believe half the compliments she gets are due to her shirtwaists. They are always as clean and dainty looking as a snowflake. She's mighty particular about them. She won't use the cheap, ordinary rosin soaps for washings, but buys this "Easy Task Soap" you hear so much about. It seems that "Easy Task Soap" just naturally goes after the dirt and doesn't eat into and rot the fabrics like the common yellow rosin soaps. It costs the same—a nickel a cake."

A Generous Gift.

"You may say what you like against young ministers, but I have nothing but praise for our young pastor," the pompous Mr. Brown remarked, as he passed out of the chruch. "Nothing but praise!"

"So I observed," dryly retorted the deacon who passed the plate.—Harper's.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

PEOPLE'S PULPIT...

Sermon by CHARLES T. RUSSELL, Pastor Brooklyn Tabernacle

ZIONISM IN PROPHECY

ADDRESS TO

A Jewish Mass Meeting—The Hippodrome Jammed

New York, October 9.—Pastor Russell of the Brooklyn Tabernacle today addressed a Jewish Mass Meeting, in response to a request sent to him by a Jewish Mass Meeting Invitation Committee. The invitation was signed by many prominent Hebrews of New York City. The invitation and Pastor Russell's response to the same follow:—

New York, September 20, 1910.

Pastor C. T. Russell, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dear Sir—Your sympathetic interest in the Jewish people for years past has not escaped our notice. Your denunciations of the atrocities perpetrated against our race in the name of Christianity has added to our conviction that you are a sincere friend. Your discourse on "Jerusalem and Jewish Hopes" has struck a responsive cord in the hearts of many of our people. Still we doubted for a time if any Christian minister could really be interested in a Jew as a Jew and not merely from a hope of proselyting him. It is because of this feeling that some of us request you to make a public statement respecting the nature of your interest in our people and we desire you to know that the statement you did make was very satisfactory. In it you assured us that you are not urging Jews to become Christians and join any of the sects or parties of Protestants or Catholics. That statement, Pastor Russell, has been widely published in the Jewish journals. We feel, therefore, that we have nothing to fear from you as a race. On the contrary, in that statement you mentioned that the foundation of your interest in our people is built upon your faith in the testimonies of our Law and the messages of our Prophets. You may well understand how surprised we are to find a Christian minister acknowledging that there are prophecies of the Bible still unfulfilled, which belong to the Jew and not to the Christian, and that these prophecies, according to your studies, are nearing a fulfillment of momentous interest to our Jewish race and, through us as a people, to the nations of the world.

These things, Pastor Russell, have led to the formation of a Jewish Mass Meeting Committee, which, by this letter, requests you to give a public discourse, especially to our people. If you will kindly accept this invitation, will you permit us to suggest a topic for your address, which, we believe, will be very interesting to the public and especially to the Jews, namely, "Zionism In Prophecy."

As for the meeting: We suggest Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, October 9th. We have secured an option on the Hippodrome, New York's largest and finest Auditorium, for that date, and we hope that this date and the place will be agreeable to your convenience. We assure you also of a large audience of deeply interested Hebrews, besides whoever may come of the general public.

Trusting to hear from you soon, we subscribe ourselves,

Yours respectfully,
JEWISH MASS MEETING COMMITTEE.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Sept. 21, 1910.

Jewish Mass Meeting Committee, New York City.

Gentlemen:—Your kind invitation to address the Jewish Mass Meeting in the New York Hippodrome Sunday, October 9th, at 3 P. M., came duly.

I thank you for the confidence which this invitation implies. The date you have selected is not only appropriate in its relationship to the Jewish New Year, but it is very suitable to my own arrangements, as I leave on October 12th for appointments in London and elsewhere in Great Britain.

Amongst the several prominent members of your race suggested for Chairman of the Mass Meeting, I select Mr. John Barrondess, because I have had the pleasure personally of conference with him and because I know him to be very loyal to the interests of your people and because I believe him to be very highly esteemed as such in the counsels of your race.

Faithfully and respectfully yours.
C. T. RUSSELL.

The Hippodrome is really an immense and elegant Opera House with a capacity of about five thousand. It was crowded today and many failed to gain access. The Jewish people of this City, who number more than a million, have become deeply impressed by various discourses which Pastor Russell has recently delivered and were alert for today's meeting—to hear his presentation of Zionism as foretold by the prophets. The speaker held his immense audience spellbound for nearly two hours, all apparently as unconscious of the flight of time as was the speaker himself. After the service the Hebrews could be seen in little knots and groups here and there in the corridors and in the streets discussing the subject. The speaker's views were evidently shared by the majority. Altogether the meeting was something unique. Never before did Jews give such attention to the message of a Christian minister. And never before did a Christian minister give such a message to the Jews.

What Pastor Russell Said.

The speaker read to his audience many quotations from the prophecies of the Bible relating to Zionism, the first one of which was Psalm cii, 13-18—"Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favor her, yea, the set time, is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. Then shall the Gentiles fear the name of Jehovah, and all the kings of the earth thy glory. When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory."

Pastor Russell declared that while once he had been inclined to discard the Bible as unreliable along the lines of Higher Criticism, he had subsequently given it very earnest study, entirely apart from all creeds and theories of men. This study had greatly enlightened his mind and had given him a very different view of the sacred Book. He now has absolute confidence in it. He now realizes, not only that there is a great Creator, but that he is definite, orderly, in his dealings with humanity, in his shaping of earth's affairs. For instance, the first Psalm quoted mentions the time, yea, the set time, for the return of Divine favor to Zion. So he finds matters all through the Scriptures. In due time David, Solomon and others represented Jehovah in the Kingdom of Israel and "sat upon the throne of the Kingdom of the Lord." Later the Kingdom was taken from Zedekiah, the last of the line of David to sit upon the throne of God's typical Kingdom. When the dominion was taken from him the Gentile governments were recognized, but not in the same manner as was Israel. None of them was designated the Kingdom of God. None of them was given perpetuity of rule.

But Gentile governments were promised a lease of power during the period when Israel would be cast off from God's favor. Then at the end of the appointed time the Gentile lease of earthly power in turn, and God's original provision for Israel to represent his Kingdom in the world, would return. These are the set times referred to by the Psalmist. God's promise to David—"The sure mercies of David"—were that of the fruit of his loins one should sit on the throne of the Lord forever. The real purport of this promise was that Messiah, the long-promised King of Israel, would be the root and off-shoot of the Davidic line and blessed of the Lord; his Kingdom should be an everlasting one and fully competent to fulfill all of the Divine promises made to Abraham—"In thy Seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Zedekiah Rejected — Nebuchadnezzar Acknowledged.

So long as God acknowledged the nation of Israel as his Kingdom their kings were his representatives; but when Zedekiah was rejected it was not inconsistent on the Lord's part to recognize the Gentile governments, as above suggested. Of King Zedekiah we read, "O thou profane and wicked Prince, whose time has come that iniquity should have an end. Remove the diadem. Take off the crown. This shall not be the same. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it until he come whose right it is (Messiah), and I will give it unto him" (Ezekiel xxi, 26, 27). It was at this very time that God gave the lease of earthly power to Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, as is related in Daniel's prophecy. Nebuchadnezzar dreamed, but disremembered his vision. Daniel the Prophet, made prisoner at an earlier date, was, by Divine providence, introduced to the king as the one person in all the world able to rehearse the King's dream and to give its interpretation, and his power so to do is declared to have been of the Lord.

Nebuchadnezzar's Vision of Gentile Dominion.

The vision was of a stupendous image. Its head of gold represented Nebuchadnezzar's Empire—Babylon. Its breast and arms of silver represented the Medo-Persian Empire. Its belly and thighs of brass represented the Grecian Empire. Its strong legs of iron represented the Roman Empire, East and West. Its feet of iron and clay represented Papal Rome. The iron continues to represent civil governments, and the miry clay, making them appear like stone, represented ecclesiasticism as it is now mixed up with the politics of the ten kingdoms of Europe. The whole period of time in which these various Gentile governments would dominate the world would last until Messiah's promised Kingdom. And this period is symbolically stated to have been "seven times"; that is, seven years—evidently not literal years, but symbolical.

At their end the lease of earthly power of Gentile governments will terminate in the great time of trouble foretold by Daniel (xii, 1). Then Messiah shall stand up in the sense of assuming control of earth's affairs and Gentile governments will cease, for all nations shall serve and obey Messiah. And then God's Chosen People, Israel, will come to the front in the world's affairs, because they will become the representatives and instruments amongst men of Messiah's Kingdom, which will be spiritual and invisible, as is that of the Prince of this world, the Prince of darkness, whom Messiah will bind or restrain during the thousand years of his reign of righteousness and destroy at the conclusion, when he shall deliver over the Kingdom of earth to the Father. Mankind will then be perfect, because all wilful sinners will be destroyed in the Second Death. Meantime, Messiah's reign will not only bless and uplift Israel, but through Israel the blessing will extend to every nation, people, kindred and tongue in full accord with the Divine promise and oath made to Abraham more than thirty centuries ago.

All this is briefly and beautifully represented in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, as explained by Daniel. He saw a stone taken from the mountain without human aid. He watched and saw the stone smite the image on its feet and behold, as the result, complete demolishment of the Gentile systems. This smiting of the image in the feet symbolically represents that it will be by Divine power that present institutions will all come to naught preparatory to the establishment of the Kingdom of God in their stead.

Messiah's Kingdom In the Vision.

Then Messiah's Kingdom, symbolized by the stone, will not only fill the place where the image stood, but, gradually increasing, will fill the whole earth. From this standpoint, said the speaker, it is not difficult for us to believe the words of the Psalmist that there is a time for God's regathering Zion, yea, a set time—fixed and unalterable. The speaker would not pretend to say the day or month or year in which these things would be accomplished—in which the Gentile lease of earth's dominion would expire and Messiah's Kingdom assume control. He did however, offer a suggestion: So far as he could discern, the time for these stupendous events is very much closer than many of us had supposed. The seven times, or years, of Gentile domination, reckoned on the basis suggested in the Scriptures themselves, should be interpreted a day for a year, lunar time. Seven years in lunar time would represent 2520 days and these, symbolically interpreted, would mean 2520 years—from the time Nebuchadnezzar, the head of the image, was recognized down to the time of the expiration of the lease of Gentile power, when the stone shall smite the image in the feet. So far as Pastor Russell has been able to determine, the year of Zedekiah's dethronement was 606 B. C. Thus calculated the 2520 years of Gentile lease of power will expire in October, 1914. There are some who claim that Zedekiah's dethronement should be dated B. C. 588. If this be true it could make a difference of but eighteen years and give the date 1932. Pastor Russell's convictions, however, favor the 1914 date.

Zionism's Future Assured.

For more than thirty years I have been presenting to Christian people the views I am today presenting specially to Jews, at the invitation of your Committee. Thirty years ago I attempted to tell to Israel the good tidings that God's set time to remember Zion had come. But that seemingly was too early. God's set time for Israel to hear was still future. I waited and am still waiting for God's own time and way for the fulfillment of Isaiah xl, 1, 2—"Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people; speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem. Cry unto her that her appointed time is accomplished, and her iniquity pardoned, for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all of her sins."

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

About twenty years ago providence raised up for your people a great leader, Dr. Herzl, whose name is now a household word with your race. While your people were unready for any message that I could give them they were ready for what God sent them through Dr. Herzl—a message of hope, a message of national aspiration which quickened the pulse of your people into new hope respecting the future of the Jews. Dr. Herzl's endeavor was to have all loyal sons of Israel rise from the dust and aspire to be a nation amongst nations and to provide a home for the persecuted of their race in Russia and Eastern Europe. Dr. Herzl struck the popular cord in the hearts of the people. At first it was purely political, and the name of Zion meant little of anything religious; but gradually Dr. Herzl and all the leaders of the counsels of your people began to see that the religious element of the movement was the strongest, the most powerful.

Dr. Herzl has been succeeded by Dr. Nordau, also evidently a man of great talent and great patriotism; but Zionism languishes. I am disclosing no secret when I tell you that amongst the leaders, as well as amongst the rank and file, Zionism is trembling in the balances and fearful of coming to naught. It has spent its force along the lines originally inaugurated; but it will not fail, as many fear. Without assuming the role of a seer I answer you that Zionism is about to take on fresh vigor; that its most prosperous days are yet to come. According to my understanding of the Hebrew prophets the time of "Jacob's trouble" is not yet ended. Further pogroms of Russia may be expected and further atrocities in Roumania and elsewhere. It is sad indeed to be obliged to admit that these tribulations will probably come to you from professed Christians. How ashamed I feel of those who thus dishonor the name and the teachings of my Master, I cannot find words to express! They are deluded. They have misunderstood the Teacher whom they profess to follow. Their thought is that God will torment eternally all who do not profess the name of Christ. Controlled by delusion they are serving the god Adversary and dishonoring Jesus. But as the trials and difficulties of the patriarch Joseph were God's providences to lead him on to influence and power and honor, so will all these experiences and persecutions work blessings for your race and tend to drive them out of their present satisfaction and make them long for home—for Palestine. These experiences, in connection with the voice of the prophets, which will henceforth more and more ring in your ears, will be the providences of God to accomplish for you more along the lines of Zionism than personal pride and national patriotism.

It is not my thought that the eight millions of Jews in the world will all go to Palestine, even though it has been estimated that, under most favorable conditions, the land could support more than twice that many. It is my thought that some of your most earnest and saintly people will go to Palestine quickly, that the rejuvenation there will be astonishing to the world. Further, it is my thought that Jews in every part of the world, in proportion as they come under the holy influences of God's promises through the prophets, will go to Palestine sympathetically—by encouraging those who can better go than themselves and by financial assistance and the establishment there of great enterprises. Permit me to suggest that in the time of trouble, incidental to the transfer of Gentile rule to the power of Messiah, all financial interests will be jeopardized. Many of your race, growing wealthy, will surely take pleasure in forwarding the work of Zionism, as soon as they shall realize that it is of God, foretold through the prophets. And those of your people of insufficient faith to use their means in forwarding the Lord's work at this important juncture will, before very long, find themselves in the condition pictured by the Prophet Ezekiel, who declares (vii, 19) that in this great day of trouble—"They shall cast their silver in the streets and their gold shall be removed; their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord." The great Messenger of the Covenant whom ye delight in (Malachi iii, 1-3) will test and prove you as a people. Those who worship idols of gold and silver, stocks and bonds, will receive severe chastisement at his hand that they may learn a great lesson before he will grant them a share in the coming blessings.

TRUSTEE'S SALE

OF

Valuable Coal

AND

OTHER PROPERTY

Situate in Garrett County, Md.,

Known as the Gillespie Property.

By virtue of the authority vested in the undersigned Trustee, by decree entered on the 20th day of May, 1910, in the matter of C. D. Gillespie, bankrupt, pending in the District Court of the United State for the Northern District of West Virginia, the undersigned Trustee will, on

SATURDAY,

the 23rd Day of July, 1910,

at Eleven O'clock A. M.,

at the front door of the Court House, in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, to the highest bidder, the following real estate, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, owned by C. D. Gillespie.

I

All the coal and the right to mine and remove the same, underlying

315 Acres of Land.

being part of a tract known as "Elk Garden," situate in Garrett county, Maryland, together with 100 acres of the surface of said 315 acres and all the rights and privileges granted to the said C. D. Gillespie in connection with said coal property. Two-thirds of said property was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Ada A. V. Halterman, by deed dated the 6th day of June, 1904, of record in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 43, folio 152, and the remaining one-third was conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Austin Brown, Sheriff, by deed bearing date December 1, 1909, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 59, folio 453, to which deeds reference is now here had for a more particular description of said property.

This property is situated very near the Western Maryland Railroad, near the station of Henry on said railroad and adjacent to the coal property now being operated by the Davis Coal & Coke Company at its mines at Henry. The coal underlying this property which is to be sold is very valuable.

II

All of the coal underlying a tract of land containing

68 1-2 Acres,

situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being known as a part of the "Elk Garden" tract and being the same coal conveyed to the said C. D. Gillespie by Peter F. Snyder and wife, by deed bearing date October 27, 1905, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 50, folio 364, to which deed reference is here had for a particular description of said 68½ acres, together with all the rights and privileges as to mining rights, surface and rights of way, as were vested in said Gillespie by said deed.

This 68½ acres of coal is considered very valuable. It is located a distance of about three or four miles from the railroad.

III

An undivided one half interest in ten acres of land, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, being also a part of what is known as the "Elk Garden" tract, said undivided one-half interest having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry E. Marshall and wife, by deed dated the 11th day of August 1902, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 42, folio 390, to which deed reference is had for a particular description of said property.

IV

A tract or parcel of land containing one acre, more or less, situate in Garrett county, Maryland, on the Western Maryland Railroad, near Gorman, having been conveyed to the said Gillespie by Henry C. Stemple and wife, by deed dated the 30th day of April, 1906, recorded in the Clerk's office of Garrett county, Maryland, in Liber No. 54, folio 454. There are situated, on this property, several buildings, one of which can be used for a combination dwelling house and store building.

All of the above described property will be sold free and acquit from all liens and incumbrances. The title to all of said property is considered good.

TERMS OF SALE.—One-third cash in hand on day of sale and the residue upon a credit of six and twelve months, the purchaser to give interest bearing notes, with good personal security, for the deferred purchase money and the legal title to the property to be retained as additional security, until said deferred purchase money has been paid.

C. W. MAXWELL, Trustee.

The above sale is continued until

Thursday, October 20th,

at 2 o'clock P. M., at the same place.

This property will positively be sold at the time and place mentioned.

NO RENO TRIP FOR JOHN OR HIS AFFINITY

Oakland Tailor is Caught and Faces Two Charges—Theft and Desertion.

It will be some time before John Bergman can sing "I'm on my way to Reno," but instead John is in the Oakland jail accused of the theft of a lot of clothing and an additional charge of wife desertion. To begin with, there is a "woman in the case."

Bergman kept a tailor shop in this place and as a side line was cleaner and repairer of clothing, and although married and the father of a child, at odd times he paid court to a woman domestic at the jail, whose husband is a convict in the Maryland penitentiary. While serving a sentence in jail for assaulting his wife, Bergman met the fascinating jail cook, and they planned to elope.

Among the clothes that he had received in his place was a coat belonging to Mrs. Arthur Lawton, of Oakland. This John packed away in a trunk along with his own clothes and, taking about $300 dollars worth of his customers' clothes, sent the trunk to Grafton and followed there on Saturday morning. The woman who, since the imprisonment of her husband, worked at the Oakland jail, was to follow down on train No. 7 that morning.

Bergman went to Grafton on an accommodation train on Friday night and there he purchased a ticket to Reno, Nevada. He then went to Fairmont and intended to join the woman on train No. 7.

Getting a tip of his flight, Oakland officials got busy and John Sweeney was put on the case by Sheriff Shartzer. Sweeney found the trunk at Grafton and he then began a search for John. Word was sent to Fairmont and Chief Watkins and the entire night force went to work on the case.

At the Fairmont station Watkins discovered two men who answered the description of Bergman as furnished by Sweeney. The Sheriff and Sweeney arrived on train No. 7 and met Watkins, who had his officers preventing either of the suspects to board the train. The Sheriff looked them over and Bergman was placed in jail. When he was searched $290 in money and a ticket to Reno were found in his pockets. He remained locked up over night and returned to Oakland on Saturday in company with Sheriff Shartzer, Bergman agreeing to come without requisition papers.

It is claimed that the would-be getaway had been well planned.

Notice to Trespassers.

All persons are hereby notified not to trespass upon my farm, two miles south of Oakland, for any purpose whatever. Persons trespassing will be dealt with according to law.

SOMEONE HUNTING TROUBLE

Obstructions Being Placed in the State Road as Trap for Automobiles.

Some individual or body of individuals are hunting all kinds of trouble and we predict the assertion that they will find it and when they do, it will not be at all to their liking, unless they prefer a term of imprisonment to their "happy homes."

For some time past obstructions in the form of immense boulders, broken bottles and heavy pieces of timber have been placed almost daily at certain points on the State Road leading north from Oakland, evidently for the purpose of wrecking automobiles or other vehicles.

A few nights ago one of the automobilists going from Oakland down the road was fortunate enough to see several hundred feet ahead of his machine two large rocks which had been placed in the centre of the track and he stopped his machine barely in time to save a wreck. To remove the obstruction required his entire strength, which seems to be evidence that more than one man was responsible for it being there.

The law with reference to obstructing the public highways is very plain and the penalty prescribed is stringent, making it both a penal offense as well as a fine.

With these obstructions placed in the road at any one of the numerous sharp curves along it, where the sight of the driver is obscured by undergrowth or fences, the chances are that not only his machine would be wrecked but that serious if not fatal consequences would befall the occupants. Drastic measures should and no doubt will be taken to put a stop to the unlawful practice.

CARTER.

DESPOTISM OF THE GARRETT COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD

A Way Practiced by that Body to Rid the County of Its Best Teachers

County Superintendent Browning acting, it is presumed, under orders from his superiors, or probably upon his own iniative, sliced the sum of $25 from the monthly salary of Mr. Bert Browning, principal of the Accident school, and in like menner reduced the salary of Miss Thayer, vice principal of the Oakland High School, $5 for the month.

What motive prompted the act unless it was to make places for favorites of the school superintendent, the public is left to judge. Miss Thayer, a lady of fine sensibilities and refinement, who by close application has fitted herself to teach in all branches of education, tendered her resignation very promptly and Mr. Browning intended following a like course until a body of Accident's indignant citizens waited upon the resident members of the school board and issued an ultimatum with the result that Mr. Browning's salary was fixed at $65 per month, whereas his predecessor received $75, and probably rendered no better service.

With the resignation of Miss Thayer, coupled with the illness of Prof. Palmer, Mr. Loraditch, who conducts the manual training department at a good salary (which was not reduced, by the way), has been acting-principal of the High School since Tuesday which, no doubt is the consummation of the school superintendent's desires and wishes.

Reducing salaries along certain lines seems to be a pastime at the school board office, but no one has yet heard of Mr. Browning reducing his own salary of $1800 per year, nor the salaries of any of his favorites, but on the other hand it is pretty generally understood that the favorites are well taken care of.

To say that the people of both Oakland and Accident are indignant at the action of the despot in the school board office is putting it [illegible] only another link in the chain of studied meanness and pettiness of that individual.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Sharp, and Dr. John Pierce, Mrs. Sharp's brother, who occupied Ohio cottage during the season, spent several weeks with relatives on Kent Island, this state, returning here last week. IMPROVISED WATER TANKS

Made of Steel Gondolas Used to Convey Water From Oakland West.

The Baltimore and Ohio is still hard put to furnish water for its motive power west of Oakland, and indeed it can be said, all along the line of the railroad.

To meet the emergency every oil tank car that can be found is being used by the railway company in which to convey water over its different lines and these have become exhausted, as the drouth extends from the Mississippi River east and north, necessiatating the hauling of water from every available point where it can be secured.

Oakland is the base of supply for this section of the country, the water being pumped from the Little Yough into tanks and drawn from thence to points west including Terra Alta, Rowlesburg and so far west as Newburg.

HOYES.

The Yester family and friends have returned to their respective homes, after spending about two weeks in our little town at Mattingly's.

OAKLAND'S NEW THEATRE WILL BE OPENED TONIGHT

By A Grand Ball for Which Invitations Have Been Issued by Proprietor Nally

Nally's Empire Theatre, Oakland's new playhouse, will be opened tonight by a grand ball, invitations for which were issued several days ago by Mr. S. A. Nally proprietor of the theatre. The music for the ball will be furnished by the Oakland orchestra, which has been practicing new pieces nightly for some time and which is composed of Miss Bessie Hinebaugh and Messrs. Calvin Echard, Dennis Rasche, Charles Liller and Roy Hinebaugh.

The new theatre is located opposite the First National Bank building on Alder Street and the structure is as near fireproof as it is possible to make it. The auditorium is located on the ground floor with an entrance straight from the street through a wide hallway. Exits have been provided which can be used in case of emergency and the building thus emptied within a very few minutes. A gallery with a seating capacity of half a hundred is over the entrance and is reached from a stairway leading from the hallway.

The capacity of the auditorium is several hundred and the seating consists of the latest improved opera chairs.

The walls of the auditorium have been neatly decorated by Mr. Parks, an artist of merit, who also painted all the stage scenery, drop curtain, etc. The work has been very favorably commented upon by all who have seen it.

The stage is of sufficient size to admit the presentation of plays with a large number of characters. The initial play will be given shortly by home talent for the benefit of the Mountain City Band. In the meantime, however, Mr. Nally will have the theatre open nightly beginning tomorrow evening as a nickledeon.

The building is provided with its own electric light plant and this, in addition to the [illegible] of Mr. John D. Hayden.

Notice.

This is to give notice that I will no longer be responsible for any debts contracted in my name by my wife, Matilda, she having deserted me.

A DISASTROUS WRECK LAST NIGHT

Trains Held up For Nearly Twelve Hours Before Traffic was Resumed.

Last night shortly before eight o'clock a freight wreck of magnitude occurred on the Seventeen-mile Grade below Swanton, blocking both tracks and impeding traffic of both passenger and freight business for upwards of twelve hours.

The wreck was caused by an eastbound freight train colliding with two helping engines, which in turn ran into the rear of another freight train, thus piling up three engines of the large class, a caboose and several cars. The engines were turned crosswise of the tracks, the latter being badly torn up.

Two of the engine crew were slightly injured as a result of the wreck.
